Eleutherios Venizelos made a striking speech, says Reuter's Saloniki correspondent.

"The Greek people," said M. Venizelos, "have been led to the brink of a precipice by a conscienceless monarchy which made common cause with the politicians of our decadent epoch. When this great war afforded us the opportunity of realizing our national ideals, our people were prevented from pursuing the path to their glory because of an alliance with hereditary enemies. King Constantine believes himself king by the grace of God. This conception is diametrically opposed to the mind of the nation, which admits of a regime of royalty but desires that the royalty shall be democratic, "Our people regard the king as the conception of the mind of the nation, which admits of a regime of royalty but desires that the royalty shall be democratic, "Our people regard the king as the conception of the mind of the nation, which admits of a regime of royalty but desires that the royalty shall be democratic, "Caucasian front—No events of importance occurred."
