For some reason she seems to have had a grudge against her children and grand-children, and so left her property, amounting to about £36,000 sterling, entailed to her heirs of the tbird generation. Her great-grandson, Wolfert Webber, knew nothing about this arrangement, neither did his two children who came over to this continent and began to increase and multiply in the most reckless manner. Meantime the property increased and multiplied also, and lately the old will was discovered. The property now amounts to about $100,000,000 and the heirs to nobedy knows how many, but they are trying to get themselves together for joint action to secure the fortune. There are at present twenty-seven men detailed for duty at the detective office. Not three of the twenty-seven have been appointed there for fitness or adaptability to their positions or their duties. Generally speaking the reverse is the case. A less qualified or more incompetent body of men could not be selected for such a service. Some of them know absolutely nothing about police duty, never having served as officers in the department, but were literally taken from the street and detailed to the detective office. It is not, of course, the officers' fault that when they get positions they rely upon their relations and friends to keep them there; it is due to the system. The effect of this is terribly demoralizing in the department, but no steps have ever been taken to check it.
