NORAH CUSHALEEN

HAUNTED CASTLE.

Mary Kendal was a lively, spirited, and intelligent girl, of a fresh, rosy complexion, with features fine and regular, without being beautiful, according to an artificial standard. But if she had not that surface beauty of countenance which provokes every gazer to admiration, she had what was better—a sweet and captivating expression. Her soul shone out of her eyes, her warm feelings played vividly to and fro on her face. You read there the minutest traits of her character.

That character was true and womanly. It was pure, guileless, and deeply affectionate. She had a nature of sympathy with all that was lovely, beautiful and good, because these were reflections of herself, and these alone satisfied and pleased her. It was impossible, therefore, that Malvrin Blantire could find favour in her eyes, by her instincts and clear perception she saw a considerable distance into his cold, selfish nature, and was, of course, disgusted and repelled. All his art could not hide his true character from her, and when she learned was, of course, disgusted and repelled. All his art could not hide his true character from her, and when she learned that he sought her hand in marriage she divined the motive and loathed him the more, and as we have seen, did not hide her thoughts and feelings from ber father, who—silly man as he was—attributed them to youth and romance.

When she quitted the room after the conversation which we have narrated, she went to her own apartment and arrayed herself for a walk. It was a bright, golden summer evening. The slanting sun shed a splendid light over the valley, casting the shadows with a deep distinctness and illuminating with a mellow radiance the rich foliage of the woods, the beautiful green of the meadows, and the grey slope of the uplands. The valley, with its mansions and castles, its woods and cornfields, by in peaceful quiet, clad in its summer laxuriance, under a blue and smiling sky; and no lover of nature could behold it without a throbbing loy, and a desire to ramble away into the heart of so much beauty.

without a throbbing joy, and a desire to ramble away into the heart of so much beauty.

Mary Kendal was a great lover of nature, and a fine summer landscape was to her an exquisite delight, she therefore sauntered on beyond the bounds of the Kendal estate towards the mansion house of Dundarra, which stood in the middle of a fine park, and was half shrouded, half revealed by some ancient trees which grew around it.

Mary not unfrequently wandered in this direction. It was a quiet secluded place, for the mansion was as good as shut up, an old woman being its only occupant. It was a sad, thing to see such a fine place deserted, and left to desolation and neglect. The building was comparatively modern, and we at one time a handsome and substantial structure, but the windows were boarded up, the doors closed and everything silent around it. He avenue was overgrown with grass, the lawn, once smoothly shaven, was tufty and rank, and weeds grew close to the principal entrance.

Mary Kendal never tired of wandering in the vicinity of this solitary mansion. There was a romance in its solitude and desolation more so than there is even about a ruin, for it had been deserted not by time, but by circumstance. It had all the elements of life and usefulness, its rooms were entire and full of furniture, its walls were strong, its appoint ments complete, and yet it was left empty and silent—a solitary and forsaken thing amid the life and summer beauty of the valley.

Musing over some sad thoughts which thing amid the life and summer beauty of the valley.

Musing over some sad thoughts which the appearance of the place called up in her mind, Mary was a untering across the park when a tremendous bellow made her start and look round. To her dismay she saw an immense bull rushing towards her. He was evidently inturiated, for he was lashing his tail, and even at that distance she could see his foaming mouth and flashing, fiery eyes. It was also evident that she was the object of his ire, for no other person was near, and he was running directly towards her. For a moment she stood motionless and he was running directly towards her. For a moment she stood motionless with terrors, but next the law of self-preservation prompted her to run, and she flew forward at her utmost speed. She had sufficient presence of mind to remember that there was a stile at the other end of the park, and it was to reach that that her efforts were made. But there was little probability that she could run so far before the bull overtook her. He was at the orgent distance helpind and was at no great distance behind, and his speed was three times as great as as speed was three times as great as her's.

With a beating, panting heartshe ran forward, not daring to look behind, but every moment the bellowing came nearer, warning her that the animal was gaining as her.

every moment the beflowing came nearer, warning her that the animal was gaining on her. This was too fearfully true. Tossing his head in a mad frenzy, and giving utterence to cries that must have sounded far through the still evening air, he plunged after her, and drew nearer every moment.

A roar more horribly distinct than the rest made Mary look round. The animal was not more than half the distance from her that she was from the stile.—Hope sank within her, and a pang of dispair fell on her heart. A fearful death was evidently at hand—a death from which no escape seemed poscible, for no one was in sight, and her cry cor'd be of no avail.

Yet to cry in the moment of extremity is natural, and she uttered one pierong shiek of alarm, which was instartly followed by a roar from the bull, so terrific as to seem at her very shoulder; she also heard the animal's hoarse, angly breathing and expected that every moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. Suddenly the stile, on which her longing yet hopeless eyes were fixed, we moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. Suddenly the stile, on which her longing yet hopeless eyes were fixed, we moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. Suddenly the stile, on which her longing yet hopeless eyes were fixed, we moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. Suddenly the stile, on which her longing yet hopeless eyes were fixed, we moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. Suddenly the stile, on which her longing yet hopeless eyes were fixed, we moment sne would be tossed upon his horns. The heavy has her. She had but time to see that it was a large Newfoundland dog, when with a deep growl he flew forward, evidentally in the bull's path.

The next instant a human figure leapt over the stile and rashed towards her.

'Courage, lady,' he shouted, 'a little more effort and you are safe. At him,

A SUMMER EVENING. We sat in our cottage doorway, Husband and baby and I, coking out over the woodland

The air was rich with fragrance
From countless wild wood flowers,
And cooled by gentle dews,
That fell in fairy showers.

And up at the evening sky.

thought of the many creatures
In the forest all around—
If the squirrels in the tree tops,
And the deer couched on the ground.

The quail and turkeys, timid,
The rabbits neath the hill;
Ever the snakes and foxes

Were every one quite still. Each with his wife and babies, (The ones whom HE loved best,) Were quietly enjoying That hour of peace and rest.

Against the luminous darkness
A star flashed out above;
And the insect world all round us
Began their songs of love.

The fire-flies flitting swiftly In myriads flashed and shone, Each, with passionate longing Seeking her own loved one.

With their lambs on the hill-top lying We saw the gentle'sheep, Thinking over their evening prayers Before they went to sleep.

The horses grazed in the meadow, Stepping soft and slow; Wherever one went, the other Felt that he must go.

Then came from the mighty forest, Very sweet, and silver clear— The voice of a wood-thrush singing, To his wife and children dear.

I said : "'Tis our Garden of Eden, Now so far away are we hidden From the strife that is going on.

Ah, why must we wake to-morrow To trouble and care and pain?

Let us soar up to yonder planet

And never return again!"
