

They have not been industrialized seriously yet by clothing regulations. Fashion styles have been restricted in the interests of textile conservation and labor saving. No luxury apparel, including more other things, bedding, dresses and wraps, negligees and special apparel clothing, may be manufactured now.

The first clothing classification order which became effective in March, 1942, prescribed the thickness and length of women's skirts and coats and eliminated patch pockets, extra pleats and extra zippers.

On the whole, however, fashion apparel had been out for pattern for 1942 summer and winter styles, and the full effect of the order is being felt only this spring and summer. There is no restriction, but limited handpower and industrial production have restricted the availability of various materials.
