THE DOG SHOW.
The tenth annual bench show of the New Brunswick Kennel Club, which is being held in St. Andrew's rink, and which was opened yesterday afternoon, is one of the best ever held in this side of Montreal. All of the classes were well filled and some of the finest dogs ever shown were in competition for premier honors. C. H. Davis of New York is acting as judge. Yesterday he passed judgment on the St. Bernards, Newfoundland, British bloodhounds, Russian wolfhounds, American foxhounds, grayhounds, pointers, English setters, Irish setters, collies, English bull terriers, Airedales.

RECENT WEDDINGS
MacLaren-Jack.
A very pretty wedding took place in St. Paul's (Valley) church yesterday afternoon when Lieut. D. Laurence MacLaren was united in marriage to Miss Dorothy Jack, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Jack. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. W. G. Watson, B. D., officiated at the ceremony. There was a touch of romance to the wedding as the groom was instrumental in saving the life of his bride two years ago at Cape Tormentine. The bride was dressed in white georgette crepe with veil and orange blossoms.

CHAPTER VII

Choked by Bob's grip so he could make no outcry, Lawless was dragged from the parsonage, then was bound and gagged by Bob and his companions. Another instant and he was on a horse and being carried away through the forest.

Not until the ring had been recovered and Dr. Kendall turned back to resume the ceremony was the absence of the bridegroom noticed. "Snaky," roused by the parson's cry of amnesia, rushed outside to look for Lawless. There was no sign of him. "Snaky" bent on solving at any cost the mysterious disappearance of his chief, mounted his horse and raced down the trail, while the minister's wife administered to Jean, still in the spell of the medicine man.

Bob realized that pursuit would be started soon, so sent Iron Star back to watch Iron Star, riding cautiously and with weapons ready, had not proceeded far when he saw "Snaky" galloping toward him and decided to employ a little strategy himself. Leading his horse back into the woods, he climbed a tree and crawling out on a branch overhanging the trail, he waited for the approaching outlaw. When "Snaky's" horse was a dozen feet distant, the Indian dropped a branch into the road. The set was well timed, for the horse, startled, halted directly beneath Iron Star, who dropped on "Snaky's" shoulders, bearing him to the ground, where he speedily disarmed him and led him, a captive, to Bob, who waited alongside the road with his other prisoner.

"Guard these men well," Bob told Iron Star, "and we will go back after Miss Benton."

The Indian tapped his gun significantly as he looked down at his prisoners and confident all would be well, Bob and Hyde started for the parsonage to get the girl.

The minister and his wife still were working over Jean when the men reached the parsonage. Bob briefly outlined the villainy of Lawless and his associates, greatly to the concern of the parson, who offered them every assistance in his power. Walking to the window, Bob said: "It is almost sundown now and that is the hour she is supposed to awaken."

They placed Jean, unresisting and unconscious, in a chair facing the window and as the shadows of the setting sun streamed through and into her face, they retired to the study. Jean moved uneasily and, as if awakened by the light, she strained forward in the chair and strove to rise, showing that the bonds within her were about to break. Miles away through the forest, the medicine man stepped from his tepee, raised his hand and broke the silence of the night.

"Spirit, go back to her," said the medicine man, and re-entered his tepee.

Jean, as if in answer to his supplication, rose to her feet, slight, complexion and memory all returned. As if in alarm, she cried: "Mr. Hardy! Iron Star! where are you?"

Iron Star, pistol in hand, sat solidly by his prisoners awaiting the return of Jean's rescuers.

"How about giving me a cigarette, Sitting Bull?" and Lawless, raising his head and seeing, as he did so, the face of Kilgore peering through the tree a dozen feet behind the Indian. Iron Star, seeing no harm in giving his prisoner a smoke, leaned forward to place a cigarette in Lawless' mouth and as he did so, the outlaw chief lunged forward and caught his fingers between his teeth. An instant only he held the Indian but long enough for Kilgore to leap on Iron Star's back and stretch him senseless with a blow from his pistol. And thus again the tables were turned. Iron Star left bound where he fell and set out vowing to get Hardy and his crowd and the girl.

Jean, fully recovered from the trance, was helping the minister's wife with supper and Bob and Hyde were smoking on the porch. Bob rose.

"I'll take Arkins and go back and get Iron Star and the prisoners before it gets dark," he announced, not noticing the pleasure of Hyde at the prospect of being left alone with Jean. Scarcely had Bob ridden away before Hyde, on a pretext, got the girl into the sitting room and abruptly told her that the property had been left to them jointly.

"Your father left you the fortune provided you married," he added.

Hyde again offered a direct proposal of marriage, but Jean flatly refused him. Then Hyde, losing control of himself, seized the girl in his arms and a scene was averted only by the sudden appearance of the minister.

Hyde, in a rage and realizing his suit was hopeless, seated himself on the porch and was plotting how best to get even with her for refusing him when Lawless, "Snaky" and Kilgore came in. Iron Star shook his head and said: "We've got to get across or fight and there's fire to our two."

The Indian shrugged his shoulders and pointed to the construction camp far below, indicating the workmen might help them, but Hardy broke in: "It would be all over before they could get here."

Leaping from the car the two men started to throw the timber out of the road when a cry of alarm from Jean called them back to the car. "The outlaws are coming," she said, and looking back down the road they could make out Kilgore's big machine racing toward them. Turning to Jean Bob commanded: "You and Iron Star cross on the stringers and go to the camp. I will follow somehow."

The Indian led the girl to the edge of the chasm and with a long pole between them as a balancer, they started bravely across and reached the further side in safety. Then looking back, Jean gave a frantic cry of terror and even Iron Star lost his customary stolidity as they saw Bob drive the car out on the span, the wheels just taking the stringers on either side.

IT MUST BE CLEAR TO EVERYONE WHO COMES TO THIS STORE WHY THIS BUSINESS KEEPS GROWING AS IT DOES

In spite of war conditions, we are excluding everything except Footwear up to our standards, and we are selling it—at not much profit—to our customers who now look to us for this kind of service.

That the business has kept on growing is not to be wondered at when you see the kind of Shoes we're selling at the prices we name. The entire stock proves the facts, and you have only to look to know why "Eaton's is so busy."

War-times have upset conditions. Our buyers, of course, are working doubly hard to find the kind of Shoes to please you with, and the fact that business keeps growing proves that they are finding it and at prices that count.
