at 924. It was at the end of an unusually active day during which trading was at times sensational. Four or five brokers representing Wall Street interests were the buyers. They were evidently trying to create the impression that there was a ready market for everything offering. But nearly everyone was selling. Some of the big spot people and other interests connected with the cotton market were as eager to sell as the bulls were to buy. On the whole the bulls found it impossible to check the downward tendency of the market although they are estimated to have purchased fully 35,000 bales of October in their efforts.
