THE ALA-KA BOUNDARY.

THE UNITED STATES AGREES TO ARBITRATION.

Treaty Signed at Washington Meets General Approval—A History of the Dispute—Three Arbitrators to Act For Each Side—Choosing an Umpire.

New York, Jan. 26.—A special to The Tribune from Washington says: Settlement of the Alaskan boundary dispute by a commission of six jurists, three appointed by the United States and three by Great Britain, was provided for by a treaty signed by Secretary Hay and Ambassador Herbert to-day, thus removing the last serious difference that for years has affected the cordial relations otherwise existing between the two great English-speaking nations. The agreement is recognized as one of Secretary Hay's most notable diplomatic triumphs, and as a striking evidence of British good-will, especially at this time of critical conditions in the Caribbean Sea. Following, as it does, within forty-eight hours of the consummation of the Panama Canal treaty, it has created much enthusiasm in Congress, as well as in executive circles here. Moreover, the new agreement is particularly gratifying to the official world here, since it is identical with the proposition submitted by Secretary Hay in 1899 and rejected by the British members of the Joint High Commission appointed to settle all outstanding differences between the United States and Great Britain.

The counter proposal made by the British at that time was for a commission of three jurists from each country, but having a seventh member, who should cast the deciding vote in case of a deadlock. After a brief consideration of the British proposal, the rejection by the British Government of a proposal to choose the seventh member from Mexico, Brazil or Switzerland, and a similar refusal on the part of this Government to accept a member from various European countries named by Great Britain, the proposition was rejected, and the Joint High Commission, then in session, adjourned indefinitely, without having decided a single one of the twelve points of difference for the settlement of which it originally met. The identical proposal now accepted marks a significant diplomatic triumph.

The proposal made by Great Britain to refer the Alaskan boundary dispute has been utterly repugnant to the United States, because the matter at issue did of all any time seem to this Government a proper question for arbitration, since it was purely a question of legal title, which could be determined definitely one way or the other—rather a matter for decision and not mutual concession. Consequently Secretary Hay has been constant in number of eminent jurists of each country. The absolute reliance this Government has always placed in the title derived from Russia has supported the United States in its contention that arbitration was not a feasible solution. The strongest expectation of a complete justification of the American title was expressed by those highest in official circles to-day.

The dispute over the Alaskan boundary arises from the claim of the Canadians, voiced by the British members of the Joint High Commission, that the line of the outer rim of the islands skirting the shore from the true sea-coast, not the edge of the mainland, and that the 30-mile strip ceded by Russia to the United States should be measured by the outer rim and not from the actual edge of the mainland. The Canadian side several seaports, including Pelly and Skagway, on the Lynn Canal. Negotiations carried on between the United States and Great Britain, which resulted in a proposition made by the Secretary of State and favorably received by Lord Salisbury, were referred to this action the British Government not merely withdrew its approval, but refused to proceed with the revision of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty until the Canadian claims in Alaska were settled. Before the Joint High Commission finally adjourned after its futile negotiations, a modus vivendi was signed on October 20, 1899. This was arranged with the express understanding that the claims of both nations should not be affected by the agreement, which was entirely of a temporary character. The arrangement, however, does not give the Canadians a free port or access to the Lynn Canal on their own territory.

The signing of the new treaty to-day is regarded on all sides as removing the sole serious difference existing between the United States and Great Britain. Of the twelve points which came under the consideration of the Joint High Commission, this of the Alaskan boundary was at once the greatest and the only question of real importance. The other questions were of much less moment. They were the rights of American fishermen in Canadian waters, the delimitation of the disputed boundary in the great lakes, and the transportation of bonded goods through certain eastern seaports. These are examples of the character of the other matters remaining to be settled. Now that a way has been found for adjusting the one great difference, the conviction is expressed by the State Department that with the settlement of the Alaskan dispute all other matters will be disposed of in short order, thus removing every possible source of irritation between the two great and friendly nations.

It is understood that the treaty has been drawn up after thorough consultation with the leading members of the Senate of both political parties, the Administration desiring to do everything possible in advance to secure ratification. The treaty will be submitted to the Senate soon, and an effort will be made to secure ratification before the end of the present session.
