What Good Would That Do Me?

By RUTH CAMERON.

A friend of mine had some expensive lingerie stolen from a suitcase which she had checked on a railway trip this summer. Owing to peculiar circumstances, she did not discover the loss for some weeks, and she was then told that it was too late to get restitution. Whereupon she dropped the matter without notifying the company or making any complaint.

Do you think that was right? I don't.

I told her so, and she said, "But why should I bother to report it? It's too late to do me any good."

"Because if you tell them of your loss, the railroad officials will be on the watch to catch the thief, and thus save other people from losing their lingerie."

"But what good will that do me?" she persisted.

I gave it up. Altruism, the belief that it is up to you to make the world a good place to live in for other people as well as yourself, is surely needed in this world.

"What good will it do me?" is a barrier beyond which many people are quite incapable of looking.

In this particular line, for instance, I don't suppose that one person out of ten would bother to make the complaint when it is too late for him personally to be benefited by it. Nor is this indifference confined to intensely selfish people. I know a distinctly generous and kind-hearted woman who was the victim of an inexcusable carelessness in regard to the transmission of a telegram. Her husband was hurt in a railroad accident and was dying. Three successive telegrams were sent to her telling her of his condition, and urging her to come at once if she wished to see him alive. All three telegrams were delayed twenty-four hours and did not reach her until too late. She never reported the matter at all. "What good would it do me?" she said bitterly. "My husband is dead."

Of course an investigation would not have done her any good, but it might have saved some other woman from a similar terrible experience.

Mind you, I do not mean that one should always be making complaints about foolish little things such as a shop girl's impatient answer, or a telephone operator's mistake. Such fault finding is inexcusable, of course. But when serious wrong is done you that is quite another matter.

"It's no good to lock the barn after the horse is stolen," is not always a true proverb. You may prevent the thief from coming back after your carriage. Moreover, if anyone else has property in that same barn, you may save him from loss; and the willingness to do this is that rare and beautiful quality which the world needs so sorely.—altruism.

The Mystery After Death.

Remarkable Address by Sir Oliver Lodge—"Memory Persists"—Science and Existence Beyond the Grave.

"Facts so examined have convinced me that memory and affection are not limited to here and now and that personality persists beyond death."—Sir Oliver Lodge's Address to the British Association last night.

It is one of the curiosities of the address which Sir Oliver Lodge delivered to the British Association at Birmingham last night that the portion of it for which he felt constrained to offer some sort of an apology to the scientific critics in his audience should also be that in which the larger audience of the world outside must take a very much greater interest.

For he dealt with the problem, as old as human understanding and as perennially uprising as human hope, of the survival of human personality after bodily death. Shall we live again? Is there something in us which does not die when death closes the door on the warm precincts of the cheerful day? And does death effect no more than the merging of the soul into some divine ether which encompasses us about, and from which individual souls are born and to which they return again, even as, in the theories of the physicists, planets and suns are born from the unseen impalpable forces of space, and into them are some day again radiated and dissolved?

Communication Possible.

To these immense, and to our way of thinking these unanswerable questions, Sir Oliver Lodge returns a more positive answer than any scientific man has ever ventured to utter from the chair in which he sat. Yes, says he, I believe, and those who have worked with me believe, that we have found and tested evidence that there is a supernatural world; that we are surrounded by intelligences, by spiritual essences, which have nothing in common with bodily existence, and yet can react on bodily senses and perceptions—can, in a word, make themselves felt by human beings.

When the case, of the belief, is stated in this way, two reflections arise which are only seemingly contradictory. The first is that no one has a right to dispute Sir Oliver Lodge's conclusions unless they first examine his evidence. The second is that it is not easy to understand how anything which is super-natural (or in the commoner term, supernatural) can make itself perceptible to the material senses. It can be tested by any of those methods of observation, measurement and interpretation with which science records and classifies the facts usually set before it.

Life and Death—"The Treacherous But Promising Shores of a New Continent."

It was in the second part of his address that Sir Oliver Lodge dealt with problems of physical research in the following passages: "Either we are immortal beings, or we are not. We may not know our destiny, but we must have a destiny of some sort. Those who make denials are just as likely to be wrong as those who make assertions; in fact, denials are assertions thrown into negative form. Scientific men are looked up to as authorities, and should be careful not to mislead. Science may not be able to reveal human destiny, but it certainly should not obscure it. Things are as they are, whether we find them out or not; and if we make rash and false statements, posterity will detect us; if posterity ever troubles his head about us."

I am one of those who think that the methods of science are not so limited in their scope as has been thought; that they can be applied much more widely, and that the psychic region can be studied and brought under law too.

"Although I am speaking ex cathedra, as one of the representatives of orthodox science, I will not shrink from a personal note summarizing the result on my own mind of thirty years' experience of physical research, begun without predilection—indeed with the usual hostile prejudice."

"In justice to myself and my co-workers I must risk annoying my present hearers, not only by leaving on record our conviction that occurrences now regarded as occult can be examined and reduced to order by the methods of science carefully and persistently applied, but by going further and saying, with the utmost brevity, that already the facts so examined have convinced me that memory and affection are not limited to that association with matter by which alone they can manifest themselves here and now, and that personality persists beyond bodily death. The evidence to my mind goes to prove that disincarnate intelligence, under certain conditions, may interact with us on the material side thus indirectly coming within our scientific ken; and that gradually

We may hope to attain some understanding of the nature of a larger, perhaps ethereal, existence, and of the conditions regulating intercourse across the chasm. A body of responsible investigators has even now landed on the treacherous but promising shores of a new continent.—London Graphic, Sept. 11.

Your Duty.

Nothing to do with the Custom House, good friend. Its only reference just now is to yourself. Let us suppose that you are a man of family with sufficient of the world's goods to keep them in comfort. Very well. You did not reach this satisfactory state of affairs without care and labour—few men do. Suppose you are awakened some night with shouts of alarm ringing in your ears. Too late then to talk of prudence; too late then to say: "If I had only, etc., etc." That "if" means too much to many forgetful people. Is it not always the duty of a self-respecting citizen to protect his home and thus provide for those within it. Is it any more than his duty to those depending on him to protect them as far as possible? Can you call your property your own when it is not insured? The answer to this argument is to carry insurance with Percie Johnson's agency, the most popular office in Newfoundland and the least expensive.

Health More Than Wealth

It is a well-known fact that the three richest men in the world would gladly barter the greater portion of their wealth for good health—literally speaking, for a good digestion. A perfect digestion is the secret of the buoyancy and vitality of a really healthy man. The state of your body and mind at the time you partake of a meal are a big feature as to the ultimate good the food will do you. If physically and mentally tired, always rest for at least ten minutes before eating.

Bad temper is enough to give you indigestion, whilst cheerful company and interesting talk causes the muscles and juices of the stomach to work properly. It seems incredible that such ulterior forces should be of importance, but science will not be denied.

Sooner than eat when not properly hungry, miss a meal. Never take food more than three times a day; use will soon accustom you to this habit. Take your meals in a well-ventilated room.

Had a Stroke of Paralysis

And Found a Cure in Dr. Chase's Nerve Food.

It is always better to prevent serious diseases of the nerves. There are many warnings, such as sleeplessness, irritability, headaches and nervous indigestion. Prostration, paralysis and locomotor ataxia only come when the nervous system is greatly exhausted. Even though your ailment may not yet be very serious, there is a great satisfaction in knowing that Dr. Chase's Nerve Food will cure paralysis in its earlier stages.

Mrs. R. Bright, 215 Booth avenue, Toronto, writes: "Two years ago my husband had a stroke which left him in a weak, nervous condition. He started taking Dr. Chase's Nerve Food and Kidney-Liver Pills, and we saw the good results almost immediately. They have made a new man of my husband and we cannot speak too highly of them."
