HELEN MOIR
 OR
LOVE AND HONOUR.

A TALE OF THE CLYDE.
 CHAPTER XXVII

"Your meaning, sir?" demanded Bridgenorth, sternly. "Is it difficult to divine, Monsieur? What purpose can I have in bringing you and Mam'selle away in this vessel but to make her my wife?"

"Oh, heaven!" gasped Helen, in horror. "Are you mad?" exclaimed Bridgenorth, "Far from it. I flatter myself my sanity was never better established than at this moment. If the course I have taken is unwise, Monsieur must not blame me. I was left without any other resource, seeing that every favor was shown to my rival, and for me only repulsion. This being so, I had to devise a plan to secure my object, and with the assistance of my good friend Jacques I hit upon this, which has been so successfully accomplished. I hope, therefore, that Monsieur and Mam'selle will recognize the force of circumstances and bow to their necessity."

"Depend upon it, sir," said Bridgenorth, "I fully recognize the atrocity of the outrage, and warn you of a heavy punishment if you do not instantly put the ship about and return with us to the place where we were entrapped."

"No, indeed, Monsieur. You do not know me, or you would understand that I am not to be frightened or turned aside. Mam'selle Moir, your daughter, has a different notion."

"It is all shadowed, and her face wears an expression of hopeless dismay. She knew only too well how unscrupulous and determined the Frenchman was."

"You see, Monsieur," went on Dubosque, "I am earnest and resolute. No power can stop me, and this being so I do hope your good sense will render violent measures unnecessary. I am ready either for force or any other course, but would prefer the latter, a guarantee for which you have in the fact that I brought you with Mam'selle, when it would have been much easier to have carried her off alone. Behold in this, Monsieur, a proof at once of my love and goodwill. Let me hope that you will reciprocate, so that amicable relations may be established among us."

"I know not what your French nature may lead you to imagine," said Bridgenorth, "but I tell you in the plainest words that I and my daughter can regard you only with feelings of detestation, abhorrence and contempt."

"Oh, Monsieur!" burst out Helen, "why will you persecute me thus?"

"For the best of all reasons—because I love you."

"No, no; you cannot love me, or you would not act so cruelly."

"I swear to you, Mam'selle, that I do love you to distraction, and my whole after life shall prove it. As my wife, you shall have everything you can wish—honor, devotion, adoration."

"I can never—never be your wife."

"Ah, but you shall—I swear you shall. You think to marry Rheinhardt, now you know that your father committed it no crime. That shall not be, Mam'selle. Mine you shall be, and we are going now to where I shall lead you to the altar—my own sunny France, where a priest shall join us beyond all human power to sunder."

"Villain, forbear such impotent threats," roared Bridgenorth, seeing the state he was in, and his eyes were thrown. "You well know your words are idle and meaningless."

"Are they, Monsieur—are they?" shouted Dubosque, with a sudden blaze of fury. "What will convince you that my resolve is fixed as fate? Shall you believe me if I send you to some other part of the vessel, and take your place in the cabin as Mam'selle's companion? By heaven I have a mind to do it, in requital of the scorn and insult I have received from you both. I have many provocations to urge me to this, Mam'selle. In your pride and haughtiness you despised me, and spurned me as an inferior thing from your presence. 'Twere good to learn you I am master now, and can exact obedience—' Ha!" he shouted, for at the moment Bridgenorth, goaded to frenzy by his devilish threat, springing upon him and plucked from his bosom a pistol, the muzzle of which he had seen protruding.

The onset was so furious and sudden that Dubosque was taken by surprise, and his antagonist had raised the trigger and presented the weapon at his bosom ere he had recovered from his amazement. The next moment would have been the French-
