reside in Kensington. When Mr. Blake died the treasury officials took possession of the personal estate, valued at £140,000, and advertised for heirs. There were many claimants, but not one succeeded in establishing a claim to the satisfaction of the chancery court. It transpired, however, that among the intestate's papers were documents indicating her intentions as to the disposal of some of her property, and certain of these contemplated legacies were paid by the treasury. The amount thus disposed of was £19,000, and the sum included an "intended legacy," of £1,000 to the late Mr. Gladstone.
