THE GRANGER'S CHOICE. BY O. G. W.

A farmer's child, Who did not seek

A woman true, And not afraid

I saw her arms, So round and white,

Nor did she blush With wounded pride,
Thus to be caught, that summe
Nor wildly rush
To hide her shame,
As if she felt her lover's scorn.

I saw her pet
The gentle kine,
And comb her pony's flowing mane,
And vowed to let
Her fondle mine,
If she my wayward locks would train.

I saw her bear The cooling draught,
The cooling draught,
To quench the hayman's burning thirst;
Aye, was there,
And gladly quaffed
The cup she put to my lips first.

The roses knew And owned her as the queen of flowers
The lilies threw
Their sweetness out,
Exhausting all their wondrous powers.

And red her lips,
Red with the warm bloods generous flo
Nor did they dread,
Those finger tips,
The red stream tingling through the snor

The granger's joys,
With such a wife,
To rival those of heaven seem;
With girls and boys,
The granger's life
Is sweeter than the sweetest dream.

A priceless pearl,
The dearest prize,
For which a man may toil and pray—
A country girl,
With soft, brown eyes—
Was she who whirled my heart away.

A grace and beauty not her own;
No paint defiled
Her honest cheek,
But such as dye the flowers alone.

To e'en confess that fragrant ball
Of golden hue,
The same hands made
That hold me with so dear a thrall.

Like lilies in the pearly form
Plunging their charms;
Her smile so bright,
Honored the toil that blesses home.

that I felt not the least desire to draw her to my heart, as had always been the case before.

'Yes, Hugh, it is I,' she said, as I looked wonderingly at her, and her tone was as icy and unnatural as her manner. 'This is my other solf,' she continued; 'my best self; and it has come for you, to you, as it must always do; for I am yours, and you are mine! You alone can save me, Hugh. I am in great danger—danger, I believe, of eternal shipwreck. I stretch out my arms for help, Hugh. Will you save me?

Her whole appearance was so unnatural that for a moment I could not respond. The words fairly froze to my lips.

'I shall be more beautiful, Hugh, after a while,' she continued, instantly divining my thought. 'The spirit is very bare now, but you will help me clothe it with all that is rare and beautiful. It is the sham alone that you miss.'

'Tell me, dear, how I can best help you—what you wish me to do for you?' I answered, with an electric thrill. 'Have I not always been ready Blanche?'

'Yes, always, and I have been most ungrateful; but I must hasten. Today, I have agreed to sell myself, body and soul, to a man we both despise. I wanted his money, or, rather, that? Blanche did. I want you, Come home directly, and contrive to save me.'

The last words were indistinct, and my next sensation was of standing in the middle of my own room, wide awake, with my heart beating so audibly that its pulsations could easily be w, counted by the heavy thump, which threatened to stop my breath.

Blanche is engaged to Mr. Ercourt—a middle-aged, titled Englishman, 'an unacrupulous scamp,' says my correspondent, 'but undeniably a millionaire.' 'And here I am,' sighed the weary man, 'and what good has it all done? I cannot induce her to listen to me seriously for one moment. One more effort, and that shall be the last.'

'Where now, Hugh?' said a sweet voice from the piazza, the next morning, after breakfast.

wonderful on that account! and then, too, it was the first day of real happiness that had come to me since we parted in New York. It was bright moonlight when I returned, and the moonlight continued in my dream—sott, lambent, unspeakably delightful. Is seemed to be in a strange place. It might have been the grand cupola of the Cathedral, Il Duomo; for I had suddenly been taken up a considerable distance, and still surrounded with works of art. The city below was enveloped in a singular white mist, singular because of a constant rolling motion like that of the sea when recovering from a storm. Suddenly the moon was obscured by a huge black cloud. When I could once more distingutsh objects about me, I found that Blanche was by my side—Blancne so pale, so still, so utterly unlike her own brilliant self, that I felt not the least desire to draw her to my heart, as had always been the case before.
