

community of prayers and other charitable works.

Let us take courage then ! United or separated, far or near, let us love one another, let us love and assist the poor. Let us love this little Society which made us known to one another which has opened to us the prospects of a more charitable and Christian life. Let us love our customs, and our rules ; if we observe them faithfully, we may rest assured that they will protect us, and protect our work. " Much evil is committed," said a venerable priest to another charitable society, " let us endeavor to do a little good." Oh ! how we shall one day rejoice at not having allowed our youthful years to glide uselessly along ? Youth is a field which requires cultivation. Let us not then hurry over it, without indulging in wholesome thoughts of the future ; let us cast an eye on every side around us ; let us gather with care the ears of corn that lie scattered at our feet ;
