Toronto's Proportion.

Asked how large a force it would be Toronto's privilege to raise, Col. Cosby replied that in view of the small total force required, and that every battalion in Canada would be given a chance to contribute, the city's proportion would not likely be more than 100 men, or at most one unit of 125. The final wording he expected tomorrow, and six hours later he could reach every man in the regiment.

At this moment a muscular, well set-up soldier, with a clear eye in his head, and wearing the uniform of a corporal in the Seaforth Highlanders, marched up, and saluted. On his breast sparkled the medals of the Chitral and Kedlve campaigns, and at his heels followed as big a throng as dogs the parade of a popular circus. The corporal was James Clark, now on furlough after all the campaign glory a man could desire.

He would not be going there to consult with other D.O.C.'s regarding the units required, as that could be done by telegraph. Throughout all the excitement strict military discipline has been preserved in the ranks of the Royal Grenadiers. Col. The long-looked-for orders were put into Col. Cosby's hands just as he dismissed this historic parade, and the excitement was then intense. The officers were surcounded by applicants, eager to try Ganadian prowess on the Boers, and had the order called for the 1000 men from Torone alone the full force would have marched out in seried ranks before the Cathedral clock chimed the middight houx.
