COPPRIGHT INT BY THE AUTHOR

Their arrival at Walcote manor was necessarily very quiet. They reached Liverpool in the afternoon of the following day, and as soon as the baggage "Did you sit up late? I was horribly the following day." could be got together started for home.

Lady Walcote had remained in the house by Lola's special wish—one of the results of the change in her feelings and Lola did her utmost to follow up the kindlier letters she had written with a greeting of really affectionate warmth. But the old lady had not changed on her side, and, though resolved to act up to the promise she had made to Sir Jaffray before the marriage, she did not like the woman he had chosen and would not pretend that she did. Thus the home coming was chilled on the threshold, and Lola herself was both disappointed and irritated, and there

With Jaffray himself his mother was all tenderness and love, but she felt the change in the position.

It was the first time that he had come home from any of his wanderings when she herself had not had the first place in Tou have been a good correspondent, Jaffray — better than usual, I think." The baronet had thoughtfully made a point of writing much more frequently than he had been accustomed to write on former occasions. "The letters from you both have been most bright and interesting. You have had her white, level teeth. "Yes, I think so. We got the last batch at New York." "And what is your theory of the five stringed violin enthusiast? Is he a lunawhen he paused, taking her oue from his hesitation. "The thing never went far enough for that. He knew no more than that I had a voice that was to be trained, and he trained it. He is a good singer as well as player. You'll hear him in all probability. By the way, I shall have to get to work and practice.

Our wanderings haven't given me much time for singing." And with that she turned the subject.

She had produced the impression she

She had told him that at one time her father had Turrian, who has a theory about vioshought of putting her on the stage, but that she had refused to go—a verdead tired," exclaimed Lola, rising the instant Lady Walcote finished. her heart, but making no outward sign CHAPTER VIII. FACE TO FACE ONCE MORE. that night was one of the hardest in the lardest in undaunted and determined. So great was her self mastery and so strong her powers of acting that Sir Jaffray did not detect a single symptom of the struggle which absorbed her.

Through the night she lay awake, never moving, lest she should wake him and so disturb her own opportunity for thought, and perhaps arouse his suspicions that something was amiss.

There were two courses open to her. One was to tell Sir Jaffray at once the whole matter and trust to his love for her; the other was to face it out and dare the man she hated to do his worst. If the man at her side had been diferent, if his sense of honor and morbid fear of the suspicion of dishonor had been less acute, she would have told him all and trusted to her love to win him to cling to her through the publicity and scandal which would inevitably follow when Pierre was set at defi-

But she dared not. She knew that Sir Jaffray, with all the influences that were round him, the strong love of truth that dominated him, the capacity to suffer rather than with a taint of dishount, would put her away from him at once, and probably he would never see her again.

The alternative was to face the other

What would he do? There was that scene on the Devil's rock, but there was no proof of what she had done. Besides, if there were, what did it matter? If she was to be dragged from the place to which she had climbed, what did it matter how far she fell? A little deeper would make no difference.

nect was not altogether unpleasing.

The girl sighed and raised her hand and let it fall on her lap as if with a Need she fall at all? That was the gesture of disappointment. She knew Pierre well, had seen through and through his sordid little soul, and could count up easily enough house," she said, after a pause, looking up into Lady Waloote's face, 'and you offer me—this,' dropping her voice, but keeping her eyes fixed steadily on the price that would buy him. Com-fort, ease, luxury, money for his vices these were his ambitions, and she could satisfy him. Sir Jaffray had settled on her companion's face,
The old lady returned the look with her an ample dowry, and she could easily get more money if she wanted it.

one quite as steady.

''What do you mean, Lola?''

''That I want to love you and you to She would go through with it, face it as she had faced her troubles and fought them down, and so great was her love me, and in place of that you meet me with diplomatic answers and neatly turned retorts. Is that all the welcome fighting instinct that, though she knew the whole happiness of her life would you have for me? Is that what our rebe at stake, the excitement of the prosons are always to be? Can Jaffray bring us no nearer than that?"

It was a subtle plea and for a moment went unanswered.
Then, taking the girl's hand with a more kindly action than she had yet shown, Lady Valcote said: "I, too, wish to love Jaffray's wife, Lola, but love is not a thing to be driven and constrained, and if you do not find me so warm as you wish you shall at least find me quite frank. I have been glad to have your letters and to see in them the little overtures which I thought I could detect. I thank you for your thoughtfulness, child, in urging me not to leave the manor, and I have staid, as you see, for the time, to see how we get on. It is an experiment, no more." "Why need we doubt the result?" "There are many reasons, but I will give you one-one that is from my side You know that I had cherished other plaus for Jaffray's marriage, that for years past it had been the strong desire of our family that Jaffray should mar ry his cousin, that Beryl has always been like a daughter of my own and that the project was infinitely dear to me. We old people do not easily pluck out from the heart a desire of this kind, that Sir Jaffray noticed it and was which has struck such deep roots there as this in mine, and I have yet to see He put it down to her being at home at the manor.

"Seems to have done you good to get home, Lola," he said. "You're not the same woman you were on the boat. how the old manor will seem to me with another in Beryl's place," "That is very hard for me to hear," said Lola after a long pause.
"It is not meant for hardness, only Where are your omens?" He smiled.
"Where, indeed?" she replied, laughing back. "I'm afraid I must have been upset by the voyage. Perhaps I thought I was going to be shipwrecked. But I'll to tell you frankly what I feel, so that you may know the full truth as to my feelings. Lola sighed, and, rising from her low chair, walked to the window and sooked out, and there was a long silence in the

"You ought to be if anywhere," he She was disappointed at Lady Wal-oote's attitude and began to regret that under the circumstances she had ever yielded to a gentler impulse to try to "Even if I manage to offend the very great personages who come here?"
"You won't do that. People aren't easy to take offense with Walcote."
"Where's the mother—Lady Walcote? appease her by getting her to stay at the maner and so win her affection. It would be an infinite complication if she was to have this sharp, clever, suspicious old woman in the house while the trouble with Pierre was befug settled, but at present her only course was to try to win her round. If that falled and she grew to be in the tired. I couldn't stay? What was that way, a quarrel must be fastened on her which would drive her away.

She was not long making her decision, and she went back and sat down again, close to the old lady, though not in the same chair she had sat in before. If she was to win, it would be by her wits and not by her witchery.
"If you reject my love, then," she said, "how are we to stand toward one another? You have scarcely thought what the effect of your words must be on me. You make me feel that I am something like an interloper in my hus-band's home and to Jaffray's mother. Is that what you mean? Do you wish me to be uncomfortable at the thought that I am not Beryl Leycester and that I did not steel my heart against your son as his mother had steeled hers against me?" "I have not steeled my heart against you, Lola. God forbid that I should do anything so wicked. I have tried to open it to you."

"And you have failed. That is even harder to bear still. I will tell you why. I have never had a woman friend in all my life except my Aunt Villyers —and the woman who is not loved by musician or other and a five stringed violin?"

"Bit of a crank, I fancy," said Sir you will. I am no pleader for the impossible. You tell me in signs that are Jaffray, laughing; "said he wanted some ret or other about a violin and plainer than words that you cannot love me, and remember that it is you who that you'd been his pupil or something years ago. Turrian his name is. Do you have laid the foundations of what may be a wall of division between us. Remember, too, that I gave you my word I would never marry your son unless Lola laughed musically and showed "What, Pierre Turrian? Oh, do tell, you yourself said yes. Never forget that, whatever may come, You say it is hard for the old to pluck from the as our friends across the water sav. I wish I'd stopped up to hear. Remember him? Of course, He's only a young man, fair, and would be handsome if harder for one like me to step out from the heaven which the love of such a man as Jaffray opened to me. Yet this I would have done had you bidden me, he hadn't a curious expression on his face which I couldn't like. He's a wonderful fiddler-wonderful-a genius as I pledged you.' Then, with a swift change of manner as though carried away by one of her uncontrollable impulses, Lola threw herself on her knees at Lady Walcote's feet, seized her hand and pressed it be-tween her own and looked with tear touched eyes into her face as she said: "Cannot our love for him and his love for us make us one, mother? Think It was the shrewdest of all pleas and, as once before it had prevailed, s now it wrought powerfully on the mother's heart. She bent and kissed Lola on the lins her own quivering slightly.

"You are right, child," she murmured. "We should be held together in his love. Forgive me if I have pained

While they were in the act of the em brace the door was opened quickly by Sir Jaffray. He stood on the threshold right well pleased with what he saw, for his great desire was that his mother and Lola should be on the closest terms.

Not wishing to disturb them, he was going away without a word when Lols called him. She was quick to see the desirability of getting confirmed in his presence what Lady Walcote had said. "Come to the mother, Jaffray," she said, "and hear what we have been deing. We have just been concluding a he insist upon doing that, as she thought very likely. But she had still to deal with Lady great treaty of love and peace. Give me your hand. ' She laughed very softly and sweetly, while her eyes shone brightly with the light of happiness, and holding one of the mother's hands in hers and taking one of Sir Jaffray's she placed all three in one clasp.
