THE BAGDAD RAILWAY AND THE BLACKMAIL OF THE DEAD

The pact between England and Russia to delay the construction of the Bagdad Railway, so much desired by Germany, will have the effect of prolonging indefinitely one of the strangest conditions of rigandage still prevailing in any part of the world. This is the blackmail of the dead conducted by the robberbands of the Tigra valley.

The story of its origin runs back some thirty years to the time when the old chief of a nomad tribe died leaving two sons, Djanir and Manna-Souleyman, to share his following and his sphere of operations. Hovering about the frontier between the Turkish dominions and Asia there continued in their father's footsteps, he was a plain, common, ordinary brigand, and so were they in their youthful vigor, however, themselves made so very obnoxious to the Shah of Persia, who was unable to hunt them down, decided to make them with them and bribe them to be good.

Djanir, the Shah's advances in a condescending spirit. He accepted a fortified dwelling near the caravan route to Tarn and he kept quiet for a little while. But his restless spirit soon became impatient, and he renewed his attacks upon travellers. He levied tribute systematically on all who passed his way, and no further effort was made to suppress him until he descended one day upon a caravan in which was daughter of the Shah, a sister of the monarch's son, who died a few weeks ago.

The brigand seized the young woman and carried her off to his stronghold. She was imprisoned in his harem and treated not as a princess but as an ordinary captive. The high temper of a Kadjar race revolted against this indignity. The Princess could not stand it, and Djanir, tired of being the Shah's daughter, decided to return her to her father riding on a donkey and almost without attendants.

It was fatal mistake. The outrage was too great to be overlooked. The Shah, who had been so kind to Djanir, and on whose word the Persians were sent to the Turkish shahs along the Persian border. By a preconcert arrangement Persians and Turks moved together upon Djanir. They killed him and carried off the women and horses and flocks of his tribe. He begged him in the castle that the Shah had given to him, stormed the place and took him prisoner. Then they dug a hole and buried him up to the neck. After leaving him a day or two in the contemplation of his position, they finally moved his head off to the ground.

So many for Djanir; but when he heard the news, Manna-Souleyman, his brother, determined to have revenge. He had the meanwhile accepted from the Turkish Governor of Bagdad the office of captain of gendarmes at Kerk, a town in Turkish Kurdistan, with convenient range of the Persian frontier. His official position had no parallel effect on his behavior. What a plunder before, now became tolls tribute; that was the only change.

But there was no joy in mere promise robbery after he had heard of the fate of Djanir. Something must be done that would make Persia and Asia smart. He called in the remnants of his brother's following and recruited his force. He established a perfid hand which is known as the mavan, and developed a bright idea set himself up as the blackmail of dead Persians.

At fifty miles from Bagdad are the cities of Nedjeb or Meshed-Ali and Kerkela or Meshed-Hussien. Thence the route of the Bagdad Railway runs, and the latter part of the trip is made by the Bagdad Railway. The prohibition of a railway from
