"THAT WOMAN"

BY MARY KYLE DALLAS.

"Hark! that woman," said Captain Miller, "Don't sing her praise to me, Paul. A rattling, detestable creature, boasting of her prowess with whip and oar, and fond of dogs and horses. She told me to-day that she could swim like a fish. You know she did; you heard her."

"The idea of having a woman, a good-looking girl, like that too! I'm unaccountably fond of dogs and horses. She told me to-day that she could swim like a fish. You know she did; you heard her."

"The idea of having a woman, a good-looking girl, like that too! I'm unaccountably fond of dogs and horses. She told me to-day that she could swim like a fish. You know she did; you heard her."

"DON'T TALK OF THAT."

"Don't talk of that," she answered. "But, actually, you were so fierce about my tomboyishness once. I know you meant me all the while."

"I was an insolent brute," he said, flushing again.

She checked him by a touch of her hand.

"I wanted to tell you how I came to be so angry with you. I was your friend and comrade. There were but two of us. We were very fond of each other, and our home was a wild country place. Had I sisters, I might have been fond of needlework and knitting, and such things; but I grew to be half a boy. He died five years ago; but I have liked those things ever since. Poor Ben! dear Ben! I shall never love any one so much."

"At that soldier's left arm crept about Mattie's waist."

"Don't say that," he whispered. "I do not want to believe that that is so. Couldn't you love me a little, Mattie? I love you better than my life. Mattie couldn't you love me a little?"

"The eyes, still full of tears for brother Ben, turned upon him kindly; the soft white hand touched his cheek."

"I think I could—the least thing in the world," she answered.

And Cap. took "that woman" to his room, and turned upon him kindly; the soft white hand touched his cheek.

"I think I could—the least thing in the world," she answered.
