

count of the cold weather, which had commenced, the British forces will not be able to march to Peking until the ensuing spring. There has been much sickness and many casualties among the British, a great many of whom had died.

The amount of booty which has fallen into the hands of the Expedition is variously stated, some of the accounts estimating it at several millions of dollars in cash. Notwithstanding the rude lesson taught him, however, no overtures had been made by the Emperor.

Another attack upon Canton, and its occupation by the British forces, was expected to take place in December. The hong merchants were terribly drained of money to keep up the defence, as well as assist in paying ransoms.

Prices of teas are ranging very high, and freights are difficult to be obtained. Ten American vessels were still wanting cargoes, when the Venice left.—Mess.
