He is Out on Suspended Sentence of Four Years - is Fifteen Years Old.

Harry Akery, the North End boy who pleaded guilty to stealing a fare box and contents from a street car, was liberated from jail today under a suspended sentence of four years in the Reformatory. The boy stated that he had been before the court on only one previous occasion when he was summoned for failing on the street.

The magistrate, however, remarked that only good-gods do not get mixed up in encounters with the law. The lad said $1.35 was in the fare box, which was equally divided between young Fish and himself. He believed young Fish had gone to the country. The boy's father appeared in court, and said he intended to fight, but it is doubtful if under the Factory Act he will be permitted to work, as he is under fifteen.

He wrote his name for the magistrate, which His Honor pronounced to be good. He is the only boy in the family, as the other children are in number, six girls. He was taken home by his father after having been informed that it was only in the interest of his moral welfare that a sentence was not imposed.
