Farm for Sale.

THE Subscriber offers for sale that valuable FARM known as the Gammon Farm, situated near Bonnell's Corner, near Mount Allison, about eight miles from Moncton. This is an excellent Farm, containing about fifty acres, with new House, Kitchen, Woodhouse, Hen-houses, Pigsty, and a fine large Barn, all entirely new and very convenient. It is thoroughly fenced, and has a well cultivated garden. The soil is dry and loamy, free from stone, and well adapted for growing either early vegetables, grain, or hay, and is now in a high state of cultivation. It is convenient to church, school, and mill, and admitted to be the finest Farm in that section. Plenty of good water on the premises. No outlay required outside of stock and farm implements. A rare opportunity is offered to anyone wishing to start a general market farm.

Palms.

"Pray read my hand," he said with a smile.

As they sat in the parlor bright, "And I will read yours," it will serve to while the moments away to-night."

She took his hand, and its lines she scanned. Then wide she opened her eyes:

"You are in love, with a girl," said she, "about my age and size."

"You've loved her long and your love is strong. The lines of your hand disclose: And you'd ask her to be your wife but I see

"That you're afraid to propose. "But you need not fear for 'tis written here. The maiden fair went on. As the palm she scanned, "to ask her hand, For her heart is already won."

Then the youth proposed, and with cheeks aflush, She answered, "Yes," with a smile; And a season of ecstacy ensued In regular Down East style.

Strange Case of Doctor Jekyll and Mr. Hyde.

BY ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

Continued.

Pooler swung the axe over his shoulder; and the blow shook the building, and the red-baited door leaped against the lock and hinges. A dismal scream, as of a manimal, rang from the cabinet. Up went the axe again, and again the panels crashed and the frame bounded; four times the blow fell; but the wood was tough and the fittings were of excellent workmanship; and it was not until the fifth, that the lock burst asunder and the wreck of the door fell inward on the carpet.

The besiegers, appalled by their own riot and the stillness that had succeeded, stood back a little and peered in. There lay the cabinet before their eyes in the quiet lamplight, a good fire glowing and chattering on the hearth, the kettle singing its strain, a drawer or two open, and the drawers of the cabinet, as if by magic, had stood long open, and the things laid out for tea: the quietest room, you would have said, and, for the glazed presses full of chemicals, the most commonplace place that might be seen.

Right in the midst, there lay the body of a man, once contorted and still twitching. They drew near on tiptoe, turned it on its back and beheld the face of Edward Hyde. He was dressed in clothes far too large for him, clothes of the most expensive; the cords of his face still moved with a semblance of life, but he was quite gone; and by the crushed phial in the hand and the strong smell of chemicals that hung about the body, it was plain that he was looking on the body of a self-destructor.

"We have come too late," he said, sternly, "whether to save or punish. Hyde is gone to his account; and it is only remains for us to find the body of your master."

The far greater proportion of the building was occupied by the theatre, which filled almost the whole ground-story and was lighted from above, and by the cabinet, which formed an upper story at one end and looked upon the court. A corridor joined the theatre to the door on the left; and with this the cabinet communicated separately by a second flight of stairs. There were besides a few dark closets and a spacious cellar. All these they now thoroughly examined. Each closet needed but a glance, for all were empty, and all, by the dust that fell from the shelves, were long unopened. The cellar, indeed, was filled with crazy lumber, mostly dated from the times of the surgeon who was Jekyll's predecessor; but even as they opened the door they were arrested by the sight of a further search, by the fall of a further mat of cobwebs which had for years sealed up the entrance. No where was there any trace of Henry Jekyll, dead or alive.

"He must be buried," said the doctor, "He must be buried here, he said, hearkening to the sound."

"Or he may have fled," said Jekyll, and he turned to examine the door in the street. It was locked, and he tapped on the door, but found the key, already stashed away in the pocket of the coat.

"This does not look like use," observed the lawyer.

"Use?" echoed Poole. "Do you mean, sir, it is broken? Much as if a man had stamped on it."

"Ay," continued Utterson, "and the fractures, too, are rusty." The two men looked at each other with a stare. "This is beyond me, Poole," said the lawyer. "Let us go back to the cabinet."

They mounted the stair in silence, and still with an occasional awestruck glance at the dead body, proceeded more thoroughly to examine the contents of the cabinet. At one table there were traces of chemical work, various measured heaps of some white salt being laid on glass saucers, as though for an experiment had been prevented.

"That is the same drug that I was always bringing him," said Poole; and even as he spoke, the kettle with a startling noise boiled over.

This brought them to the fireside, where the easy chair was drawn closely up, and the tea-things stood ready to the sifter's elbow, the very sugar in the cup. There were several books on a shelf; one lay beside the tea-things open, and Utterson was amazed to find it a copy of a pious work for which Jekyll had several times expressed a great esteem, annotated in his own hand, with startling blasphemies.

Next, in the course of their review of the chamber, the Commissioners came to the chival glass, into whose depths they looked with an involuntary horror. But it was so turned as to show them nothing but the rosy glow playing on the roof, the fire sparkling in a hundred repetitions along the glazed front of the presses, and their own pale and fearful countenances stooping to look in.

"This glass has seen some strange things, sir," whispered Poole.

"I echo the lawyer in the same tones. "For what did Jekyll catch himself up at the table with a start, and then conquering the weakness: "what could Jekyll want with it?" he said.

"You may say that!" said Poole. Next they turned to the business table. On the desk among the neat array of papers a large envelope was open, and the contents were oppressed, and bore, in the doctor's hand, the name of Mr. Utterson. The lawyer unfolded it, and several enclosures fell to the floor. The first was the will, drawn in the same eccentric terms as the one which he had returned six months before, to serve as a testament in case of death and as a deed of gift in case of disappearance; but in place of the name of Edward Hyde, the lawyer, with indescribable amazement, read the name of Gabriel John Utterson. He looked at Poole, and then back at the paper, and last of all at the dead mallefactor stretched upon the carpet.

"My head goes round," he said. "He has been all these days in possession; he had no cause to like me; he must have raged to see himself displaced; and he has not destroyed this document."

He caught up the next paper; it was a brief note in the doctor's hand and dated at the top. "O Poole!" the lawyer cried, "he was alive and here this day. He cannot have been disposed of in so short a space; he must be still alive, he must have fled! And then, why fled? and how? and in that case, can we venture to declare this suicide? O, we must be careful. I foresee that we may yet involve your master in some dire catastrophe."

"Why don't you read it, sir?" asked Poole.

"Because I fear," replied the lawyer, solemnly. "God grant I have no cause for it!" And with that he brought the paper to his eyes and read as follows:

"My dear Utterson,—When this shall fall into your hands, I shall have disappeared, under what circumstances I have not the penetration to foresee, but my instinct and all the circumstances of my nameless situation tell me that the end is sure and must be early. Go, then, and read the narrative which Lanyon warned me he was to place in your hands; and if you care to hear more, turn to the confession of my unworthy and unhappy friend,

HENRY JEKYL."

"There was a third enclosure?" asked Utterson.

"Here, sir," said Poole, and gave into his hands a considerable packet sealed in several places.

The lawyer put it in his pocket. "I would say nothing of this paper. If your master has fled or is dead, we may at least have his credit. It is now ten; I must go home and read the documents in quiet; but I shall be back before midnight, when we shall send for the police."

They went out, looking the door of the theatre behind them; and Utterson, once more leaving the service, gathered about the fire in the hall, twined back to his office to read the two narratives in which this mystery was now to be explained.

DOCTOR LANYON'S NARRATIVE.

On the ninth of January, now four days ago, I received by the evening delivery a registered envelope, addressed in the hand of my colleague and school-companion, Henry Jekyll. I was a good deal surprised by this; for we were by no means in the habit of correspondence; and I had seen the man, dined with him, indeed, the night before; and I could not but be struck by the fact that he should have written to me, and that he should have written to me in the formal of registration. The contents increased my wonder; for this is how the letter ran:

"Dear Lanyon,—You are one of my oldest friends; and although we may have differed at times on scientific questions, I cannot remember, at least on my side, any break in our affection. There was never a day when, if you had said to me, 'Jekyll, my life, my honor, my reason, depend upon you,' I would not have sacrificed my left hand to help you. Lanyon, my life, my honor, my reason, are all at your mercy; if you fall me to-night, I am lost. You must suppose, at this preface, that I am going to ask you for something dishonorable to grant. Judge for yourself."

"I want you to postpone all other engagements for to-night—aye, even if you were summoned to the bedside of an emperor; to take a cab, unless your carriage should be actually at the door; and with this letter in your hand for consultation, to drive straight to my house. Poole, my brother, has his orders; you will find him waiting your arrival with a lock-smith. The door of my cabinet is then to be forced; and you are to go in alone; to open the glazed press (letter E) on the left hand, breaking the lock if it be shut; and to draw out, with all its contents as they stand, the fourth drawer from the top (which is the same thing) the third from the bottom. In my extreme distress of mind, I have a morbid fear of midnight; 'g' you; but even if I am in error, you may know the right drawer by its contents: some powders, a phial and a paper book. This drawer I beg of you to carry back with you to Cavendish Square exactly as it is."

"This is the first part of the service; now for the second. You should be back, you set out at once on the receipt of this, long before midnight; but I will leave you that amount of argu, not only in the fear of one of those obstacles that can never be prevented nor foreseen, but because an hour when your servants are in bed is to be preferred for what will then remain to do. At midnight, then, I have to ask you to be alone in your consulting-room, to admit with your own hand into the house a man who will present himself in my name, and to place in his hand the drawer that you will have brought with you from my cabinet. Then you will have gratified your part and earned my gratitude completely. Five minutes afterwards, if you insist on an explanation, you will have understood that these arrangements are of capital importance; and that by the neglect of one of them, fantastic as they must appear, you might have charged your conscience with my death or the shipwreck of my reason.

"Confident as I am that you will not trifle with this appeal, my heart sinks and my hand trembles at the bare thought of such a possibility. Think of me at this hour, in a strange place, laboring under a blackness of distress that no fancy can exaggerate, and yet well aware that, if you will but punctually serve me, my troubles will away like a story that is told. Serve me, my dear Lanyon, and save me."

Your friend,
H. J."

"P. S.—I had already sealed this up when a fresh terror struck upon my soul. It is possible that the post-office may fail me, and his letter not come into your hands until to-morrow morning. In that case, dear Lanyon, do my errand when it shall be most convenient for you in the course of the day; and once more expect my messenger at midday. It may then already be too late; and if that night passes without event, you will know that you have seen the last of Henry Jekyll."

Upon the reading of this letter, I made sure my colleague was insane; but still that was proved beyond the possibility of doubt. I felt bound to do as he requested. The loss I understood of this farago, the less I was in a position to judge of its importance; and an appeal so worded could not be set aside without a grave responsibility. I rose accordingly from table, got into a hansom, and drove straight to Jekyll's house. The butler was awaiting my arrival; he had received by the same post as mine a registered letter of instruction, and had sent at once for a lock-smith and a carpenter. The tradesmen came while we were yet speaking; and we moved in a body to old Dr. Denman's surgical theatre, from which (as you are doubtless aware) Jekyll's private cabinet is most conveniently entered. The door was very strong, the lock excellent; the carpenter avowed the would have great trouble and have to do much damage, if force were to be used; and the locksmith was about to begin, when this last was a handy fellow, and after two hours' work, the door stood open. The press marked E was unlocked; and I took out the drawer, and it filled up with straw and tied in a sheet, and returned with it to Cavendish Square.

Here I proceeded to examine its contents. The powders were neatly enough made up, but not with the nicety of the dispensing chemist; so that it was plain they were of Jekyll's private manufacture; and when I opened one of the wrappers, I found what seemed to me a simple, crystalline salt of a white color. The phial, to which I next turned my attention, might have been about half-full of blood-red liquor, which was highly pungent to the sense of smell and seemed to me to contain phosphorus and some volatile ether. At the other ingredients, I could make no guess. The book was an ordinary version book, and contained little but a series of dates. These covered a period of many years, but I observed that the entries ceased nearly a year ago and quite abruptly. Here and there a brief remark was appended to a date, usually no more than a single word: "double" appearing perhaps six times in a total of seven hundred entries; and once very early in the list and followed by several marks of exclamation, "noted, failed!" All this, though it whetted my curiosity, told me little that was definite. Here was a phial of some tincture, a paper of some salt, and a record of a series of experiments that had led to many of Jekyll's investigations (and I might say, to many of his practical uses). How could the presence of these articles in my house affect either the honor, the sanity, or the life of my mighty colleague? If his messenger could go to one place, why could not go to another? And even granting some impediment, why was this gentlemanly to be received by me in secret? The more I reflected, the more convinced I grew that I was dealing with a case of some kind of madness. I dismissed my servants to bed, I loaded an old revolver that I might be found in some posture of self-defence.

"The Central Experimental Farm (near Ottawa) is in a state of great activity. A large package of apple trees from Russia arrived on Saturday week. Fruit and ornamental trees are arriving daily. Over two hundred farmers from all parts of the Dominion have already taken advantage of the opportunity to have seeds tested free. Twenty acres will be sown this spring with new varieties of Russian wheat, the seed from which will be distributed free in small quantities to all farmers who apply, in the order of their application, until the supply is exhausted. The Government deserves great credit for the establishment of these farms, which are calculated to do a great deal of good. The maritime farmers should take advantage of the central farm as it will be some time yet before the farm for the maritime provinces will be available.

FROM PROF. LAWSON, SECRETARY CENTRAL BOARD OF AGRICULTURE OF NOVA SCOTIA.
"I have used the 'Nutritious Condiment' originally introduced by you in 1872, and have been well satisfied. It has been found to be of great value in the treatment of all diseases of the digestive system, and I should be unwilling to be without it. I believe it to be a valuable article of diet."
Yours truly,
GEORGE LAWSON.

DEAR SIR:—I was induced by one of your agents to try your Manhattan Condiment. Although I had very little faith in it, I took one 10 lb. bag to try as an experiment. I fed it according to directions to one cow that was giving milk. At the end of the first week we found an improvement, and for the past four weeks she has steadily improved in quantity of milk and also in quality; her general appearance has been greatly improved, and I should be unwilling to be without the Condiment, for I believe it to be a valuable article of diet."
Yours truly,
