Desperate Remedies

A pause ensued, which was terminated by Miss Aldelyffe.
"I understand," she said. "Now, though

"I understand," she said. "Now, though I have no direct right to concern myself with any of your private affairs (beyond those which arise from your misleading me and getting the office you hold)——"

"As to that, madam," he interrupted, rather hotly, "as to coming here I'm vexed as much as you. Somebody, a member of the Society of Architects—who, I could never tell—sent to my old address in Loudon your advertisement cut from the paper; it was forwarded to me; I wanted to get away from Liverpool, and it seemed as if this was put in my way on purpose, by some friend or other. I answered the advertisement certainly, but I was not particularly anxious to come here, nor am I anxious to stay."

ticularly anxious to come here, nor am I anxious to stay."

Miss Aldolyffe descended from haughty superiority to womanly persuasion with a haste which was almost ludicrous. Indeed, the Quos ego of the whole lecture had been the less genuine menace of the imperious ruler of Kinapwater than an artificial utterance to hide a failing heart.

"Now Mr. Manston, you wrong me; don't uppose I wish to be overbearing, or anything of the kind; and allow me to say this much, at any rate, that I have become interested in your wife, as well as in your-self."

suppose I wish to be overbearing, or anything of the kind; and allow me to say thing much, at any rate, that I have become interested in your wife, as well as in your self."

"Gertainly, madam," lie said slowly, like a man feeling his way in the dark. Manston was utterly at fault now. His previous experience of the effect of his form and fearth and the self that he could account by the same law of natural selection for the extraordinary interest Mias Aldelyffe and hitherto taken in him, as an unmarried man; an interest he did not at all object on the estate as if he were its lawful owner. Like Curius at his Sabine ferm, he becomed it his glory not to possess gold himself, but to have power over he wild did. But at this hint of the lady's wish to have his wife under her wing also, he was perplexed; could she have any sinister movive in doing so! But he wing also, he was perplexed; could she have any sinister movive in doing so! He took the letter to the house, and it being too late for the country post, sent one of the stable-men with it to Troominster, instead of troubling to go to Creaton with it himself as hereofore. He had no longer any necessify to keep his continuous seventh of November.

But the next morning Manston found that he had been forgeful of another matter, in naming the following Monday to his wife for the journey.

The fact was this. A letter had just come reminding him that he had lift the whole of the succeeding week open for nimportant business engagement with a neighboring land-agent, at that gentleman's residence thireten miles off. The particular day he had suggested to his wife, had, in the interim, been appropriated by his correspondent. The meeting could not now be put off.

So he again wrote to his wife, stating that business, which could not be postponed, called him way from home on Monday, and would entirely provent him coming all the way to fetch her on Sunday night as he intended, but that he would meet her at the Cartiford Raad Station with a convey ance when she arrived there in the evening.

The next day came his wife's answer to his first letter, in which she said she would be ready to be fetched at the time named. Having already written his second letter, which by this time was already in her had, in the meantime, let it generally become known in the village that he was already to be fetched at the time named. Having already written his second letter, which by this time was already in her had, in the meantime, beyond a atrong curiosity to see the lady's face, was well-night extinguished.

THE EVENTS OF A DAY AND NIGHT.

1. November the twenty-eighth. Uutil 10 pm.

Monday came, the day named for Mrs. Manaton's journey from London to her husband's house; a day of singular and great events, influencing the present and the future of nearly all the personages whose actions in a complexed drama form the subject of this record.

The proceedings of the steward demand the first notice. Whilst taking his breakfast on this particular morning, the clock actions in a complexed drama form the subject of this record.

layed. After all, it was perfectly natural that you should have spoken unkindly as you did, ignorant as you were of the circumstances which bound me.

So I have made arrangements to fotch you home at once, It is hardly worth while for you to attempt to bring any luggace you may have gathered about you (beyond mere clothing). Dispose of superfluous things at a broken's; yous bringing them would only make a talk in this parish, and lead people to believe we had long been keeping house separately.

Will next Monday suit for your coming? You have nothing to do that can occupy you for more than a day or two, as far as I can see, and the remainder of this week will afford ample time. I can be in London the night before, and we will come down together by the mid-day train.

Your very affectionate husband,
