"Yes, way up," he answered.

As he spoke he stepped close to Montgomery's side and raised his voice.

"Stop a bit," said Joe, halting. "I shan't need this now," and he drew the plece of gas pipe from his trousers pocket. "I'd have hammered the life out of Andy Gilmore!" he said, as he tossed the ugly nave nammered the life out of Andy Gli-more!" he said, as he tossed the ugly bludgeon from him.
"You haven't told me where you have been," said Langham, and once more he pressed close to Montgomery, so close that their elbows touched.

The handy man moved a little to one side.
"Where ain't I been, you'd better ask, boss," he said. "I've seen more rotten tetties and more rotten towns and more towns and more towns and more towns." boss," he said. "I've seen more rotten cities and more rotten towns and more rotten country than you can shake a stick at. Everybody I seen was strangers to me, never a face I knowed before; Chicago, Kansas City, St. Louis, Denverbah! Old Mount Hope's good enough for me!" and the handy man shrugged his huge shoulders.

"Mighty little!" agreed Montgomery.

"Say, step over, boss—we want to keep in the middle. There, that's better; I was clean outside the rail."
"Can you swim?" asked Langham.
"Never swum a siroke. The dirt's good enough for me; I got a notion that these here people who are always dippin' themselves are just naturally filthy. Look at me, a handy man, doing all kinds of odd jobs, who's got a better right to get dirty—but I leave it alone and it wears of! I'm blame certain you won't find many people that fool away less money on soap I'm blame certain you won't had had people that fool away less money on soap than just me!" said Joe with evident satisfaction.
