WAR SUMMARY

THE DAYS EVENTS REVIEWED

WHILE one set of overwrought critics are preaching to the people of the United Kingdom and France that the war will yet be long, and while other sets of critics with axes to grind and little else to write about, are belaboring and dubbing as incompetent British officers and generals who are giving up their lives that the empire may live, the allies' generals and soldiers are pushing steadily forward their preparations to grind the German war machine to a pulp. That job may take a month or it may take a year, but if they keep long enough at it, they can do it, for the resources of the grand alliance, the slow in developing, are immensely superior to the resources of Germany. It is also certain that when the British and French resume their offensive in the west it will be not so much to pierce the German lines as to knock the Germans out. It will be in the form of a chain of battles, fought, perhaps, on the same lines that the allies are holding now. The winner of the last battle wins the war. He may lose everyone to the last and then come in strong.

If the German lines are too strong to force this year the allies can continue the arming of hordes of Russians—Russia has a population of 170,000,000, and as she has the best chance to gain her aspirations that she will have in a hundred years, she will be with the allies to the end—and keep hammering away next year at the German lines. Germany's supply of men is not inexhaustible. Signs, indeed, are not wanting that she is nearing the end of her resources. In regard to persons who say that it is preposterous to believe that the allies can dictate peace in Berlin, the answer may be given that it depends upon many factors which are unknown outside of the allied war councils. But the teaching of history is that such a war as this war must be fought to a finish. It was so with Napoleon. The
