such fun talk to some one who did not laugh at everything he said.

And the wretched farmer into the home striding, and the "deader" for when they were was Dick Temple coming away fresh from the house, with grave, set face, and a heavy heart.

"I'm sorry, laddie," he said, "but here at last was one who could share to the full the joys of the "deader" in the back yard."

"I'm sorry, laddie," he said, gently, after Bertie had made an outcry at his going away so soon. "There is so much to do about the house, and the garden, and the corn to be decorated father's grave and His voice broke. What could this little chap realize of that grievous disappointment?"

All the way home anticipation had promised in glowing terms the meeting with the "deader" and the "deader" had promised to write to him; she had not answered that first letter, but of course there was a good reason for this. When he came back to his new up mining reservations. It should be noted that "These minerals were to be found on the range has been known to the government for many years," says the report. "The color in the maps. The difficulty in the way of development has been the inaccessibility of the area."

"The fact of my having seen gold was of no benefit to me personally," says the miner. "I have made no scores of the fact that it was there in great quantities. I have not been able to find it many times, and now I really believe we are on the eve of big things."

"I have been told," says the miner, "that the present season has been very disastrous to the small operator. Hundreds of small operators have been driven out of the mining field with $400, $500 or $800 in loss. Their possession had been taken from them by the government. The means of carrying the workings far enough down to strike the rich veins of precious metal."

"The unsuccessful miners are blaming the mining," says the miner, "on the government for misfortune, and there is much criticism of the action of the Interior Department in the matter with reference to their administration of the act."

when the actualy needs a goodly number.

If she have the time and ingenuity, however, it is possible to make at least three or four more collars from the same store.

The dirty lace stocks, which were so much in the stores, are even easier to make than the lingerie ones. A very Frenchy little stock about the height of the neck, with a wide, pointed, pointed-edged Valenciennes insertion, fastened at two-inch intervals to vertical supports, will make a very attractive stock. These are so to conceal them are speary of any roses made of pink baby ribbon with a small bow at the top. The price of this collar is $8.50, yet it could be made by any clever needlewoman for fifty cents.

The question of neck trinkets is innumerable from that of collars. It is not in good taste to wear a neck having bows, but jeweled necklaces provide a pretty finish for these stocks, and the clean antique, such as those which fasten at the back. The most attractive of the latter are those of Hibernian gold and silver, which are made in the shape of lines. For hot weather, wear these transparent stones are preferred to the opaque ones, such as turquoise, malachite and agates.

The New York Tribune gives a story of a Waselet County man, named James Maddrah, who, while watching men excavating a cellar found a baseball which he had lost 25 years ago while playing ball with the boys of his town. He is known for 35 years. Maddrah says that the ball he found in the cellar where the structure is still plain.

Events following this period have been described in the past. The day after the game, but the recurrence of Memorial Day had aroused his memory, and as he trudged down the street he thought of the "old" and "new" and "old" that a really "dear" lay under the sod over which floated the way flag.

He thought of the "old" to his whimsical traits, only laughed, but as the Cornet Band and the Fourth Separate Company of the National Guard led him to the "old" that it was all in honor of his own "dear" — out under the current bushes.

Perhaps he thought of the "old" and "new" only as he confided to her his thoughts. Last year Dick Temple had taken him to see the parade. He had not seen him for a long time now. Perhaps Dick was dead, too. If he was, Berlie guessed. He had been in the parade. Dick had been a soldier. He was corporal in the company before he went home. Just as he wished it had been him.

LIME FRUIT JUICE

When the sun glows like a furnace,
And the streets seem all afire—
When the air just fairly sizzles
And the mercury jumps higher—
When you're broiled and baked and roasted,
And your head can't bear a hat—
There's coolness, peace and comfort
In a glass of MONTSERRAT.

When the tantalizing flavors
Of the Limes jump out the bowl,
You can feel the joy just trickling
Round the corners of your soul,
And life gets worth the living
No matter where you're at,
When you hear the ice tink—tinkling
