CONSTANTINOPLE

(Toronto Mail and Empire)

Liman Von Sanders, the German general with the Scotch name, who was commander-in-chief of the Turkish armies in the Great War, expresses the opinion that Britain could defend Constantinople against Kemal Pasha. Liman, like most other loyal Germans, is no doubt hoping for a Turkish victory should war be declared between Britain and Turkey, but he probably knows that Kemal would find the capture of the city a matter of great difficulty, if not impossible, especially since he could not reach it for the month. The British navy is now on the spot, and with the troops that could be rushed to the front in a fortnight, could probably hold the Straits indefinitely. History shows that Constantinople is an easy city to defend. It has been attacked scores of times, but has fallen only three times. In each case it was forced to capitulate by the operation of armies on its European flank. Never has it been taken by an army advancing from Asia. Yet that is what Kemal must attempt if he makes up his mind to defy the British.

The city with its suburbs is formed by two European and one Asiatic peninsula. The European part consists of Stamboul, where stand most of the Turkish public and private buildings, and is the old site of Byzantium, which was captured by the Ottoman Turks in 1453. Pera contains most of the foreign residences, and at its tip is the commercial quarter of Galata. The Asiatic peninsula is Scutari. In some places the Bosphorus is only half a mile wide which leads a French expert to remark that the Turkish four-inch guns could command the European quarter of Constantinople. At some points the Bosphorus is too narrow to permit much freedom of operation to battleships, but at other
