Bass' Ale.

Everybody knows of the healthful, invigorating qualities of Bass' Ale, and that as a tonic or palatable beverage it is superior to any brew.

Consequently during the various bottlings of Bass' Ale it is that of Hibbert's, and this is the brand sold by the Leith House for years, always giving pleasure and satisfaction to our patrons.

With the approach of warm days comes an increasing demand for Hibbert's Bottling of Bass' Ale, and we have just reached our store room, ex Barmingham, and we are supplying in the following quantities:

Bbls. of 4 dozen Quarts.

Bbls. of 8 dozen Pints.

and its contents is enough to send a chill of horror through the most stoical, and all the more so to fire insurance men. The fact is, there is not one cent of fire insurance in this city, and the reason is plain. This brings home neglected opportunities when they are most needed. In this age of efficient business men, there is no excuse for the low cost of SOUND PROTECTION, little sympathy is shown for such losses when such neglect is unwar- rantable.

For over 10 years the ACADIA FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY has been carrying these burdens, and providing

A Splendid Opportunity.

Here is a splendid opportunity for a few gentlemen willing to form a country club. The property comprises about 150 acres, with a splendid golf course and barn. Nearly forty-five acres are under cultivation. It can be purchased for a very low price and on easy terms.

"Good king!" The sweat broke out on the man's face. "You ought to be arrested."

Ross took a step toward him. "Tr at your service."

"Keep off!" shouted the sheriff.

Ross smiled, then became very serious. "I took every precaution, Mr. Deputy. I destroyed everything that could possibly carry the disease. I burned every utensil, including the saddle—everything, but the man's horse."

"The officer caught up his hat and coat and started for the door. "It's me for the open air," said he.

As he was about to leave, Sheriff Ross followed them and, standing in his door, delivered his final flog. "If this state does not punish those fellows every decent citizen should engrave on his tombstone, 'He died of the worst of the vilest and their agents of prey.'"

Gregg as he retreated backed: "Thank all right, Mr. Ranger, but what'll I do for the wife for the town in the old home I'll have one room to myself which shall be no consolation to the miserly fellow, when I am within it I can fancy myself sick in the camp."

He thought of South Africa as a possible place for a hiding away, and that no other place could have the same indefinable charm that the Rocky mountains possessed for the Reason man. He had come to that at his most important moment, and he was not surprised that, for all its faults, seemed merely an extension of the English form of government.

Weatherford was also moving in deep thought and at last put his perplexity into a question. "What am I to do? I'm beginning to feel queer. I reckon I have chances for my life, but they are pretty flake. Maybe I'd better drop down to Sulphur and report to the authorities. I get a report or two before my blossoms will begin to show on me."

Cavanaugh studied him closely. "Now, don't get to thinking you've got it. I don't see how you could catch a germ. The high altitude will clear the winds up there enough to prevent infection. I'm not afraid for myself, but I'm afraid for you. You'd better pull out tomorrow."

Late in the day Weatherford expressed deeper desolation. "I don't see any chance for me. I'm sure I'm infected. 'If I go back to the pen' I'll die of lung trouble, and I don't know how I might to earn a living in the country. I don't know where I should be to take the pox and go under. I'm afraid of big towns," he continued. "I always was, even when I had a chance to see a doctor, and broke I don't go. No city for me."

Cavanaugh's patience gave way. "But, son, you can stay here. I'm packing up to leave. You'll have a chance of getting out of the country to go when I go and in my company." His words were full of assurance, but the Reason man felt its edge, but he made no reply, and this sad silence moved Cavanaugh to repentance. His irritability was the result of something deeply changing in his own nature.

Approaching the brooding felon, he spoke gently and sadly. "I'm sorry you're in this fix, but I'm sure that, but it's up to you to get clear away so that Lee will never by any possible chance

There's a beautiful land, on a beautiful shore."

Where everyone's happy all day long. Where everyone's happy, the past is no more, The future's a shadow, and the future's no more. The region of rest for the weary The land known by old names and new, The land where the dream is true."

She seeks the one she loves best, The land where our dream comes true."

The land where our dream comes true."

A hand behind the long years through Her sorrow, she knows, will exist no more, The land where our dream comes true."

And this beautiful land, on the beautiful shore, Is peopled by sweet fancies rare, And a long time ago she was before, Flank on the sweet breeze there, The land that is ringing with laughter, The land where our dream comes true."

The land that our dream hereafter— The land where our dream comes true."

"Yes," he answered; "I saw him yesterday, just after dinner, down at the shore, and he looks so much better than the dark. Almost immediately after he was mottled and rode away. He was much cut up over his child's disappearance."

"Why has he not written to me," she asked herself, "and why should he have gone away without a word of greeting to me? I am sure that if it would have taken but a moment's time to call at the door."

The more she dwelt upon this neglected matter, the more it became. After the tender look in his eyes, after the ardent clasp of his hand, the thought that he could be so indifferent to her, the source of pain and self reproach.

With childish frankness she went to Lisa and told her what she had learned, and Lisa told her what she had learned. "Rose came to town and went away back to his cabin without coming to see me."

"Ah, you are sure he's been here."

"Yes. He came in, got some letters at the postoffice and then rode away," she volunteered, and her disappointment and grief overcame her.

...that you are alive." She has a romantic notion of the role representative of the old time west, and she was a dreadful shock to her if she knew you as you are, and leave her, I know, now that you're seen, but that's the mainly thing to do—the only thing to do."

"Oh, you're right-of course you're right. But I wish I could be of some use to her. I wish I could come and watch over her. I'd be glad enough to play the scullion in her kitchen. But if you're going to take her, I'll go."

"But I'm not," protested Ross. "I'm

Wetherford looked at him with steady eyes, into which a keen light leaped. "Don't you intend to marry her?"

Ross turned away. "No; I don't. I mean it is impossible."

"Why not? Don't you think you're already married?" He said this with menacing tone.

"No; I'm not married, but—"

He stopped making his meaning plain. "I'm going to leave the country soon."

Wetherford caught him up. "I reckon you understand what you're doing. You consider Lizzy and me undesirable parents—not just the kind you'd sort out of the herd of your own free will. Well, that's all right. I don't care a rap so far as I'm concerned. But you can forget me—better make a dead one. I'll never bother her nor you."

Ross caught Cavanaugh threw out an impatient hand. "It is impossible," he protest.

"No," said Cavanaugh. "It's better for her and better for me if I should do so. I'm going to leave this world to my own people."

Wetherford was thoroughly roused now. Some part of his old time fire came back to him. He rose from his chair and approached the ranger firmly. "I've seen you act like a man, Ross Cavanaugh. You've been a good lawyer these last few years. You couldn't have treated me better—and I hate to think of it. But my girl

Ross told I could see that. I could see how lean he was."

"Ross said slowly: "It will be hard for you to understand when I tell you that I saw a great deal for your daughter, but a man like me—An Englishman—cannot marry her or he has to marry—for himself alone. There are so many others to consider—his friends, his sisters—"

"Westbrother dropped his hand. "I see!" His tone was despairing. "When was young we married the girls we loved in defiance of everything. But you are not that kind of man. You may be right. I'm nothing but a debilitated old cowpuncher branded by the state—a man who threw away his chance—no," he can tell you straight I've learned that nothing but the love of a woman counts."

In the meantime Lee Virginia waited with increasing impatience for the arrival of her relatives' return from each room to see him appear at the door. But when three days passed the whole town was profoundly excited over the murder, that she knew, and she began to fear that some of the negroes' enemies had worked their evil will upon him.

With this vague fear in her heart, she went forth into the street to inquire. One of the first ones she met was Sheriff Stroff, who was sitting, as usual, under the heavy tree down, smiling, his medicine bottle at hand.

"Have you seen Mr. Cavanaugh?"

"No," said Stroff.
