"Her father, of course, flew to rescue his precious daughter, and brought her home, and put her in one of the best schools in New York — the Misses Mull's. And he moved to New York himself, at a great sacrifice, for he had a prosperous business in Philadeiphia. He has never succeeded in anything since; he was a broken man."

"And Lidian?"

"The Misses Mull did all that could be done. I know the school; it has a splendid tradition. There are certain things in prides itself—good voices, good manners,—and I confess the girl has manners—and high-bred penmanship,—she does write a superb hand,—and a good knowledge of French and English literature. They learn pages and pages by heart."

"Oh," I groaned.

"Twas of a Holy Thursday, their innocent faces clean."

'What are you talking about?"

"What letters?"

"The letters that came every day, and which she asked the postman to tuck into her New York paper. That affair is what made her come here. Her father has brought her away for a summer to break it up; but he, poor man, now never will go back."

We rose together, as if we had had enough. "Don't be unkind!" I pleaded as we walked toward the house, "We have both been rather excited; but I am your friend."

"I began to doubt if I had a friend in the house since she came," poor Mrs. Belter ended. It was striking eleven.

chamber, I was startled to be challenged by that lady's voice demanding who was there.

"You?" she hissed through the crack of her chained door, "What is happening?"

I explained my innocent purpose, but she begged me to wait; she had something to communicate. I lifted the shades in the parlor, and let in the dim gray light of a cloudy dawn. My mind was in a whirl of wild surmises aroused by the passion in Mrs. Belter's voice. In a few moments she came to me in some of her tragic robes, her face white and tense.

"Is it really morning?" she sald, and then, with something like a sob. "The end has come!"

"You mean?"

"Did she really have a message?" I asked.

He grasped my hand, and the old smile came back, and with it my faith; for though the battle had only begun, and pain and devastation might follow in its wake, the determined passion for beauty was there, and it would surely win.

If the substance of poetry be, as Wordsworth declared, past emotions recalled in tranquility, Louis Noel has ample store of material for his first volume. But not in "Songs of Innocence" will she live, or in chaste numbers akin to Herbert and Vaughan.

With him gone, with her gone, the world has become strangely gray; after her, all other women seem — but that is another story.

"You mean?"

"But I saw that Louis's meeting her when she came in gives her more shame than my knowing it, though she trusts him not to tell, and she never will trust me." Mrs. Belter drew down the corners of her mouth to beautiful resignation; but her revenge had been complete.

"Sweet Day, so cool, so calm, so bright"

I mocked.
"For goodness sake!.. interjected Mrs. Relter.

"They are all gone into the World of light."

Louis avoided me, but on the following Sunday I stumbled on him in Mrs. Belter's parlor. where he was saying good-by, for he left that morning. There were tears in that lady's eyes, but cheer in her voice.

"Oh, yes, you will, she was saying: and then, appealing to me, "Won't he?"

We rose together, as if we had had enough. "Don't be unkind!" I pleaded as we walked toward the house, "We have both been rather excited; but I am your friend."

"I began to doubt if I had a friend in the house since she came," poor Mrs. Belter ended. It was striking eleven. VIII.

I was awake before dawn after tossing about the few hours of the night, to detach this oman from my feelings, and let her roll round in earth's diurnal course with rocks and stones and trees.

The night had been warm, and finally, too impatient to lie still longer, I rose and slipped into some clothes, to get a breath of air in the garden. As I was putting on my shoes, I heard a step on the bare stairs that led from Louis's turret, and I thought, he also is too feverish to keep indoors

I soon followed him down the hall, which was in perfect darkness, and I wondered why he had turned out the light. As I tiptoed by the "Key of the House." as Mrs. Belter called her chamber, I was startled to be challenged by that lady's voice demanding who was there.

"You?" she hissed through the crack

AMUSEMENTS.

JERE MCAULIFFE IN "A DAUGH-TER OF THE PEOPLE"

With six nights and five matinees next week, Jere McAuliffe presents no less than ten plays and seven big vaudeville features and on Thursday might a lot of clever amateurs will try for a money prize. A Brandon paper says of Jere's trip out there:

Last evening Jere McAuliffe and his supporting company again played to a crowded house. The play was that mirth-provoking Irish comedy, "Shamus O'Brien." As on the previous two nights of the company's Brandon engagement, the bill was splendidly produced, round after round of applause greeting each artist in turn.

He would be exacting who would pick a flaw in the manner in which that most versatile of actors, Jere McAuliffe, portrayed that interesting Irish character, "Shamus O'Brien."

Mr. McAuliffe had a particularly hard role, and the way in which he portrayed both the comic and the pathetic was remarkable.

The part of Sir Reginald Dare, a loyal friend of O'Brien's, required an artist, and in this Fred Martel filled the requirements. His clever impersonation of the English characteristics, and his flashes of rare humor, made him a favorite with the audience.

ANOTHER FEATURE PICTURE PROGRAMME AT THE UNIQUE. PROGRAMME AT THE UNIQUE.

The Unique's pictorial programme today will be of surprising excellence, having as its headliner Lubin's latest hit. The Sexton of Longwyn, a great feature in color. The Sexton of Longwyn is a dramatically told story of the heights and depths to which a bad man will go to accomplish his ends. A rich lover of a poor girl cannot appreciate the astonishing fact that another is preferred, notwithstanding his money, and he attempts to force a marriage. But the heroine has a true friend in the old sexton, who spoils the villain's game right at the altur. Two other features from the Pathe studio and a rip roaring comedy will give splendid support to the feature picture.

The Cameraphone will have no performance today. Tomorrow afternoon an entirely new bill will be shown and in addition to the regular programme, "The False Coin," or "The Boy Hero," will be shown as a special feature for the children. This picture is of a boy's father who was arrested for counterfeiting and was afterwards proven innocent by his eight-year-old son who discovers the real counterfeiters and arranges a capture by the police.
