POPULARITY OF KAISER IS DOUBTFUL EVEN IN GERMANY

Monarch Is Hair Brained and Capricious, And His Hold On Affections of Populace Was None Too Stable Even Before The War

The man on whose head rests the responsibility for this awful world conflagration is known in this country practically as nothing but the ruthless soldier, the clumsily intriguing diplomatist and the idol of his misguided, uninformed people. There is, however, another side to Wilhelm II; and before the war there was a side to the peoples of Germany, even to the people of Prussia, that might well have led them to repudiate the words and acts of their Kaiser since August, 1914, if in war they had retained the judgment they showed in peace. A couple of years after the hundred days' reign of Frederick III the plodding mind of the German people irked with misgivings. The young Emperor "dropped the pilot" making his first veiled declaration of divine right, and soon extended his imperial infallibility to his person as war lord, poet, composer, dramatist, preacher, protector and critic of all the arts.

To those Germans who had sincerely loved their "alter Kaiser" for his kindness and for his wisdom in choosing advisers and helpers capable of supplementing his own deficiencies in statecraft; to those who had fairly adored Kaiser Frederick, who, in their imagination, was ever riding his steed to the victory of Weissenburg or lying on his bed of pain, Wilhelm II. was but an overgrown, turbulent, many-titled youngster, whose misfortune it was to have opened his eyes in a palace instead of a hut and to have had from birth the freedom of the snaffle and a double bit might have broken him to harness.

So Germany laughed at his frowns, and "Simplicissimus" set its fangs into his multifarious majesty. His First Offence. Berlin's first protest against Wilhelm the Pretentious Arbitrator came when he chose the plans for its new cathedral. It was all very well to listen to the Kaiser's "Song of Aegir" everywhere, from concert hall to market place, or to give up the opera house for a few nights to his gorgeously staged ballet-pantomime "Sardanapale," but it would never do to let the old city be blemished by Hohenzollern art. Berlin did not forget the two great vases of the Kaiser's "Song of Aegir" set upon a mantelpiece of spinach and onion by the color blind "old Emperor," nor the other impossible combinations of colors, forms and styles prevalent in Hohenzollern dwellings. From the pompous palaces to the humble hunting lodges. They had been pointed out by respectfully apologetic guides to hundreds of visitors.

It was imperative to check the young Kaiser's tendency toward expansion in the artistic field. But Wilhelm could not easily be stopped, for the mayor of Berlin played into his hands. With dynamic energy the Kaiser proceeded to study the gentle old avenue in the park, the "Siegesallee," with what were called "the white dolls," and then to erect in a semicircle to face the venerable old Brandenburg Thor; two fastidious fountain pen flanking the heroic statues of Wilhelm's parents, the ill-fated Frederick and the Empress Victoria, daughter of Britain's Queen.

Something had to be done to prevent the Kaiser's gaudy and tasteless Berlin thought the matter over and elected a Socialist Mayor, and, in spite of the imperial veto emphatically insisted on his choice—till his majesty yielded with an ill grace. Prussia brought from many quarters has taught him to yield in the nearly thirty years of his reign. Every one knows the instance when Chancellor and Reichstag nuzzled their noses against sovereign after the blunder of the divine right speech at Konigsberg.

Not long before that Berlin had had an example of Wilhelm unstrained. It was at the unveiling of the fountain of Neptune in front of the imperial schloss. The city, having paid for it, wanted it to face the city. The Kaiser, having given permission for its emplacement, wanted it to face his palace. The city has its way; Neptune turned his back on the Kaiser. The Mayor was making his dedication speech when, like the ghost of Banquo, the Kaiser appeared at the feast and vented his spiteful wrath on all concerned. Even his own press agents had to call the incident "most regrettable."

Not that the capital entertained a standing feud against the imperial pest. It merely insisted that the cobler should stick to his last. Whenever Wilhelm showed himself in his inherited dignity as Emperor he held the gallery. The bugle call of his automobile horn and the appearance in the streets of his cream-colored cars, Wilhelm was sensitive to such flattery, even as the "common people" were sensitive to the jovial, studiously democratic manner in which he declined to address them on his daily walks through the Tiergarten. In their eyes, as no doubt in his own, it made him the true descendant of Frederick the Great, who took the historic chaff of the Potsdam miller so graciously. Imperial Affability. One day, a French girl found herself facing the Kaiser and his suite on a footpath in Berlin park. She drew aside to let the uniforms pass, but Wilhelm stopped: "Fine weather for walking," he announced, "taking a stroll, little Fraulein?" "Going to my music lesson, your majesty." "Inquiries into the nature of the lessons and the name of the teacher, he nodded: "That's good. Where is your home?" "In Paris, your majesty." "He who perhaps even then dreamed of a certain Michaelmas dinner in the Gallery of Mirrors at Versailles, where the grandfather had received the imperial crown, nodded again and smiled: "Ah, Paris! Paris is a jewel worth a great price!" And turning, to the three officers he rushed up to add in excellent French: "Those little French women, so proud and fearless! They are charming! Bonne promenade, mademoiselle, et a revoir!"

Another smile, a salute and he marched off. Did those three helmeted men chuckle within their greatcoats? Never did Wilhelm miss an opportunity to show his affection for France and things French. Even when Cecilie bought her entire trousseau in Paris before becoming the bride of the Kronprinz, the Kaiser was deaf to the grumbling of the German tradespeople and praised her marriage some said that her lungs were too delicate to stand the Berlin climate, as others whispered that her sensibilities were too fine to endure the Kronprinz, Wilhelm arranged for her to spend her winters incognito at the Riviera, having her rushed up to the capital only for important court affairs or just before the birth of her children.

Fond of Theatre. French theatrical companies coming to Berlin were regularly patronized by Wilhelm. A French farce sent him into boisterous laughter, making him slap his right thigh with his healthy hand, while the crippled left hand lay limply on the red plush balustrade. At such times it seemed as if long laughter were his natural expression. There was one night at the theatre when the Empress gave the audience a shock. A few months previous she was a pink-faced, matronly woman with slightly graying hair and inclined to stoutness. The famous trip to Palestine lay between, and—so it was said—a life-endangering cure for obesity ordered by the Kaiser and taken under the personal supervision of his inventor, Professor Dr. Schwenger. Now her hair was snow-white, her body thin and her smile pathetically cutiful. German women began to pity her, and a tale was revived of how in the early days of her marriage she went weeping to the Emperor, who patting her hand and said: "If you wanted a model husband, you should not have married a Hohenzollern."

Auguste Victoria, of whom startlingly little has been heard since the war, must have made the best of a bad bargain; for never again was she known to complain—not even when Wilhelm left her alone on his yacht in the harbor of Venice to visit the Countess Morosini. Since 1871 it has become a tradition in Prussia to wear hats to every emperor. The character of the first Wilhelm, that indefatigable worker for the Fatherland, was expressed in the words "I have no time to be tired." Learn to suffer and be silent" was accepted as the characteristic advice of the well-worshiped Frederick. For the peripatetic Wilhelm brought from many quarters has taught him to yield in the nearly thirty years of his reign. Every one knows the instance when Chancellor and Reichstag nuzzled their noses against sovereign after the blunder of the divine right speech at Konigsberg.

Not long before that Berlin had had an example of Wilhelm unstrained. It was at the unveiling of the fountain of Neptune in front of the imperial schloss.
