

The Tourist's Decalogue.

We copy from the Wheelmen's Gazette the following, which, though written originally more particularly for the tourist, will we think apply universally:—

1. I will not run needless risks, remembering that however smart my fancy riding may appear to these strangers, they will never see me again; whereas it will probably be, not the traditional fair maiden, but the hotel boot-black, who will care for me while my bones are mending.

2. I will not forget that a look in time saves a break-down.

3. I will not run risk of violating the cycling laws of the towns I pass through, thus discrediting the wheel in that community.

4. I will not ride in the heat of the day.

5. I will not be ashamed to walk when I get tired and a mile on foot would rest me.

6. I will not "sass back" the small boy, because that encourages him to pay similar attentions to the next cyclist; nor will I consider any man's crossness a blot on my sky, but only on his own.

7. I will not carry heavy burdens, while our American civilization runs express trains.

8. I will not run my bicycle by ice-water or soda-water or fire-water, or any other kind of water than Adam's ale.

9. I will not ride at night, unless guaranteed nine hours' sleep before sunrise the next morning.

10. I will not fail to drop a comical postcard for the folks at home into every post-office on the way.

Dan. Godfrey, the famous bandmaster of the Grenadiers, kept his eightieth birthday last Sunday, and continues to be passionately fond of cycling.—Bi. News.
