IMPORTANT TO RAILWAY MEN.

A large percentage of the accidents to which railway employees are liable is due to the 'frog' used in connection with railway switches, which has caused many a poor switchman and car-coupler to 'eroak." One trial of its bootjack attachment has frequently lasted for life, and it is bootless to describe the sufferings of the is bootless to describe the sufferings of the victim, whose sole relief was when the end waxed near. To obviate such accidents, Mr. Charles II. Wakefield, of this city, has patented a device which is not only simple and effective, but inexpensive. Its cost will hardly exceed that of a dozen of railway spikes, and it is criminal on the part of any railway company that hesitates to adopt it, as it requires no more work in applying it than is necessary in driving a couple of spikes, while the device itself can be made in any blacksmith's shop. Mr. Wakefield will dispose of the patent, or the right to use the device on any line of railway. Further particulars on application to the patentee, or the publishers of this paper.
