Artaxerxes Mnemon, king of Persia, being upon an extraordinary occasion, reduced to eat barley-bread and dried figs, and to drink water; "What pleasure," said he, "have I lost till now, by my delicacies and excess."

When Cato drew near the close of life, he made this most benevolent declaration to his friends: "The greatest comfort of my old age, is the pleasing remembrance of the friendly offices I have done to others. To see them easy and happy by my means makes me truly so."
