Indeed so highly honored were these victors that the reception of Brasidas at Scione is thus referred to by a Grecian writer:—"The government gave him a crown of gold and the multitude flocked around him and decked him with garlands, as though he were an athlete."

There is not yet a college for the study of medicine in China, but two are now under way—one at Singapore and the other at Shanghai. Anyone can proclaim himself to be the medicine man of his district. At times he is required to do some surgery, which is very crude and primitive, for the barber is still the recognized man for little value, but the spotted horn is a wonderful cure for intestinal troubles at least so says Dr. Yik. Another legend tells that when the country was ravaged by pestilence, Iphitus inquired of the oracle for help and was bidden to restore the Olympia, there was found a bronze disc for life, just for fun. inscribed with the names of Inhitus and Lycurgus, along with the regulations of the games. It is thus inferred that the contests were a primitive observance of the Eleians and Pisans, and first acquired their celebrity by the powerful concurrence of the Spartans. From 776 B. C. there is an almost unbroken record of the names of the victors. The first dozen or so names are of Eleians only, but in later years include athletes from other branches of the Doric races. The Clympiad was at first only a small gathering, but became a great point of union and in time grew to be the highest festival. It survived even the extinction of national liberty and had nearly completed twelve centuries when it was abolished by the christian when it was abolished by the christian old ruler of the house called after him to come back and shut it.

Preceding the games, heralds proclaimed throughout the nation the truce of God, which put a stop to all warfare and insured safe conduct during the sacred month. Sixteen women, representing eight towns of Elis and Pisatis wove a festal robe for the Olympic Hero. In the gymnasium at Elis, candidates from all parts of Greece were tested before they were described to the committions and the admitted to the comptitions, and the officials who chose the contestants and who later awarded the prizes assumed a title giving them national distinction.

Thus under the guarantee of the strongest military state and at the same time with the solid support of the other states the Olympic games became illustrious and for hundreds of years were a recognized national institution. In the earlier years of the games the prizes were of some intrinsic value, but after the sixth Olympiad the only prize or each contest was a garland of wild olives cut with a golden sickle from the sacred tree brought by Hercules the greatest athletic meet of modern times. King Edward has personally interested himself in the affair in the hope of making it the best yet held under the auspicies of the International Olympic Movement.
