A LUXURY FOR JAPAN TEA DRINKERS

A tea that is absolutely pure.

GREEN is displacing Japan just as "SALADA" black tea is displacing all other black teas.

Etruggling for calmness the young girl raised her head from his shoulder. "It was in the evening," she said, faltering; "he had not come in to dinner, and I was alone in the drawing-room when he returned. He complained of headache, and said he would go to his room. He had a letter to write, he said. When he said 'Good-night' it was not like a usual 'Good-night'. He took me in his arms and blessed me, as if he were going away."

Her voice faltered. Douglas felt his heart sink. Proof after proof was pouring upon him. He waited silently, air ost breathlessly, in his anxiety for the next words.

words.

The girl went on:

"I asked him if anything was the matter. He did not answer, but looked at me so sadly; but with so much love that I could hardly help crying. Then he smiled faintly, called me a foolish child, asked me if I had seen Andree lately, if I thought she loved you very much."

Again she hesitated. A spasm, as of mortal agony, crossed her brother's face.

Andree! He had lost her, too!

"I told him that I was sure of it. He seemed pleased, kissed me again and went away. Only three hours after they came for he; he was dying." And the girl trembled and clung to her brother at the recollection of the scene she recalled. "He could hardly speak; but he smiled at me and murmured, "Tell Douglas that I did not—tell him—" He had not strength to finish. Before the doctor could come he was—"

I did not—tell him—' He had not strength to finish. Before the doctor could come he was—'
Her voice utterly failed her, and with moan of pain she again hid her face. 'I am going to send you to bed, dear shild," he said, after a long pause. 'You must let me be both father and brother to you, Kathie. Nay; you will go when I ask it, little one," he went on, as she resisted. 'I cannot have you ill.'
"I will go, Douglas," she said, submissively; 'but first I must give you this."
She took from her dress a little folded note, which she put into his hand. It was addressed in a handwriting very famillar and very dear to him, and written on very dainty cream-laid paper, embossed with a wonderful monogram in blue and silver, in which a very careful searching might have discovered the initials "A. M." Douglas crushed it in his hand with a movement which spoke of passionate pain. Then he led his sister to her room, and left her with a few tender words to the care of the old house-keeper. Slowly returning to the dining-room he opened the little note, read it over once, twice, and pressed it passionately to his lips.

"Poor child," he murmured, sadly, "she room he opened the little lote, read re-over once, twice, and pressed it passion-ately to his lips.

"Poor child," he murmured, sadly, "she little knows to what her generosity ex-poses her. Such a sacrifice is impossible. I, ruined, beggared, dishonored, my name dragged in the mud, execrated, coupled with every form of reproach, of ignominy—I to marry her—I the son of a bankrupt—of a—"

Ito marry her—I the son of a bankrupt—of a—"
He did not finish the sentence. The last word brought back all the terrible doubts which were so quickly becoming certainties; and, throwing himself into a chair, he flung his arms across the table and bowed his head upon them.

Tho candles died out; the fire burned way and glimmered more and more teebly; the gray dawn stole into the room and it found Douglas Lancaster still in the same attitude of utter despair, fighting manfully, however, with his anguish and wrestling with his sorrow.

Poverty, dishonor, shame!—were these the gifts the New Year had intended him to receive?

CHAPTER V. Ten days had elapsed from that momentous day when the appalling whispers of Lancaster's ruin had begun to circulate, and already the nine days' wonder of the immense failure had faded from the minds of those who were not personally concerned in it. Those who were had found their losses complete and irretrieven able, and numbers of men in every pro-tession and trade had been ruined by Mr.

Lancaster's fraud.
There was no excuse for him—the mad ventures; the insensate risks he had run; the reckless speculations could have been but the result of a gambling mania, by which others had suffered and would me, how bitter was the repentance of those who had trusted him! How useless the mourning, how worse than useless the cry which went out against him! Douglas Lancaster had faced his trou-Douglas Lancaster had faced his trou-ple manfully, as a brave man should; everything he possessed, even the price of his commission, he had given up. What small amends he could make he had made; he retained nothing; but yet the storm against his name, against the father whom he loved, still raged fear-fully. People, frantic with their distress, must abuse somebody, and the real cul-prit having escaped their vengeance by death they nouved their indignation, in prit having escaped their vengeance by death, they poured their indignation, in no measured terms, on the dead man's son. That he suffered terribly was undoubted; but one cause of sorrow he was spared. Sir Frederic Palmer was able to state that his examination had proved Mr. Lancaster's death to have been from heart disease, accelerated by trouble, and whatever the unhappy man's intended by the control of the control tion had been, he had been mercifully spared carrying out the dreadful deed he had seemed to contemplate, and the weight this knowledge lifted from the weight this knowledge lifted from the son's heart was tremendous. He was sitting this evening—the tenth, as I have already said, from the mournful events related—alone in the library, busy with an accumulation of papers spread upon the desk before him, and as he bent over the writing materials, the handsome face looked greatly altered. It was wan and worn. Deep lines were graven on the broad brow and round the mouth, now so set and stern, while in the dark-gray eyes lay a shadow of deep pain, and into the dark hair had crept one or two silver threads.

The papers before him were not only business ones; they were chiefly, indeed,

The papers before him were not only business ones; they were chiefly, indeed, old private letters of his father's, which Douglas was glaneing over, and then with an almost tender respect committing to the flames. He had come at last upon a packet of faded epistles, tied together with a faded ribbon, whose color had once been blue, and as he had opened them a few withered flowers had fallen out. They were love letters, written by his mother before her marriage, and it touched Douglas to see how his father, among all his business cares, had found leisure and attention for these missives, written by the warm-hearted Irish girl who had been the mother of Kathleen and Douglas.

So absorbed was he in his perusal of the tender words penned by the gentle hand so long since crumbled into dust, that he did not hear a knock at the door, which was twice repeated. Then, still unheeded, the door was opened, a light footfall crossed the floor, there was a rustling of a silken dress, and he started as if from a dream when a little hand was laid on his clustering dark hair with a tender, lingering touch, and a voice, whose sweetness and tenderness of intonation made the word itself sound like a caress, spoke his name:

tonation made the word itself sound like a caress, spoke his name: a caress, spoke his name:

"Douglas!"

He looked up vacantly for a moment, and met a pair of tender, loving eyes, in whose pitying, sorrowing gaze he could see, he could guess, from its wistful tenderness, how altered he was; he saw a face, pale and troubled, truly, but as loving, nay, doubly so, as when he had seen it last—the face of the woman he loved so passionately, so hopelessly now that a gulf, inseparable as the grave itself, had opened between them, and whom he could think of no more, save as a treasure far out of his reach. For lew moments, as she stood there in her trailing, soft black robes, she seemed to him more like a vision than a living woman, and it was only when a tear fell on his hand that he knew that a real presence, Andree Marchmont herself, stood beside him.

"Douglas," came the tender whisper stood beside him.

"Douglas," came the tender whisper again, and with a smothered groan he would have risen, but she put her hands on his shoulders to keep him seated, and, passing one arm round his neck, drew his head close to her, resting her cheek upon it in a mute tenderness so full of love, that Douglas turned and clasped his arms round her with a sudden passion he could not restrain.

"My darling-my darling!" he said, brokenly. [To be Continued.]

This old English game will be played this afternoon at Wolseley Barracks between picked teams of the right and left-half companies, and each week practice games will be played every evening to introduce this oldtime game. INTERESTING GAME AT BAR-RACKS. An interesting game of baseball was played on the military grounds at Wolseley Barracks last evening between teams representing the right and left half companies. The right half company had the advantage of having Lance-Corporal McFadden for from the steamer Australian this morntheir captain, and the left had Pte. Harry Donaghy. Both sides played to Dorval at once. The boat differs in from the class of 20-footers used on good ball, and the fielding was many instances exceptionally good. Lake St. Louis.

The home run of McFadden was as LAWN fine a hit as was ever seen on a baseball diamond, and if such a thing were possible he could easily have made a home run and a half so far did the ball travel. Messrs. Clarkson, Farnsworth and Scanlon also made home Pte. Donaghy, at third base, made an exceedingly fine catch of a foul ball, running fully 20 yards to make the catch. The umpire was Sergt. J. Cockburn, and the official scorer was Pte. H. G. Millie, the secretary of the Wolseley Barracks Athletic Association.

CANADIANS WON. New York, July 10.-The Canadian cricketers wound up their trip at Bayone, N. J., yesterday by defeating eleven representatives of the Metropolitan District Cricket League by an isning and 122 runs. When the first day's play was ended last evening, the visitors had made 147 runs for the mistory while the Metropolitan property was property while the Metropolitan property while the Metropolitan property was property was property while the Metropolitan property was property was property while the Metropolitan property was property while the Metropolitan property was property while the Metropolitan property was p loss of one wicket, while the Metro-politan players had only made 97 in their first inning, and Laing and Henry made a splendid stand against bowlers that were frequently changed until the score passed the 200 mark. Laing made 103 before he was clean bowled by Tyers. This was the only occasion during the trip of the Can-adians that any of their number had made a "century." W. A. Henry, of Halifax, had put together a careful 41 before he was put out, leg before wicket, on Worm's bowling. The entire side was not disposed of until the total reached 266. After lunched the home players went in to try and save a defeat by an inning, but they were unable to do so, owing to the splendid bowling of McGiverin and Rooke. Jack Adam, who, by the way, two twos and a single. The other wickets fell very cheaply. Four of the players were stumped by Wright, three off McGiverin and one off Rooke. In all, McGiverin took six wickets for 18 runs and Rooke four wickets for 35 runs. The bowling and fielding of the visitors was very much superior to that of the local men, and the result was a foregone conclusion early in the game. WRESTLING.

RUHLIN DEFEATS FITZSIMMONS. New York, July 10.-Gus Ruhlin and Bob Fitzsimmons, in a Graeco-Roman wrestling bout, attracted 2,500 people to the Madison Square Garden last night. Ruhlin was both cleverer and heavier than the Cornishman, and Watch for our Big Seven won two falls in succession with a quarter of an hour's rest between them. Ruhlin showed that he knew a great deal more about the game than Fitzsimmons did, and it was the latter's agility which prevented his being thrown much more quickly. When they faced each other the spectators cheered as Fitz, in trying for a hold swung his right as if he were going to fight.
