

The adoption of the International Convention Against the Taking of Hostages represents the most recent example of the results of cooperation among members of the international community in the struggle against terrorism. It also represents a success for the United Nations itself. It is fairly well drafted and despite some minor loop-holes should constitute an effective instrument for dealing with hostage-taking. Implementing legislation in the form of amendments to the Canadian Criminal Code is now under preparation.