

away from this speculative exhibition of monetary theories and get down to business to-morrow so that we may make some real progress in regard to this resolution.

Might I just ask the minister, in view of the flow of eloquence and the multiplicity of words to which we have been listening, not to forget that in the course of my budget speech, in the remarks I made on this resolution, No. 1, I asked certain specific questions which I think are of very great importance and which we would like to have elucidated. I hope he will not forget them to-morrow.

Mr. ILSLEY: I wholly agree. I was a little diffident about asking the committee to curtail general discussion, because the budget debate was very short, and leaders of all opposition parties made reservations of the right of members of their parties to discuss matters rather generally on the resolutions; but I am wholly in accord with the appeal of the leader of the opposition to members of the committee that to-morrow, when we start, we take the resolutions up resolution by resolution and apply the rules strictly to the resolutions, and I shall be prepared as best I can to deal with the matters raised by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I say just a word? I think possibly I would have liked to have joined in this general discussion on monetary affairs. We hold very definite views; we believe, of course, that not until you have placed the principal means of production, the economic monopolies, and the financial system under the direct control of the community can you balance purchasing power with production. But we wished to facilitate the business of the committee and refrained from taking part in the discussion. I am sure that to-morrow we shall be very glad to cooperate with the minister, the leader of the opposition and the house generally in trying to get these resolutions through as quickly as proper consideration will permit. We shall have some other opportunity to place our economic and financial policies again before the house.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.
