Mark Twain on the Problem of Human Existence.

A myriad of men are born; they labor and sweat and struggle for bread; they squabble and scold and fight; they scramble for little mean advantages over each other; age creeps upon them; infirmities follow; shames and humiliations bring down their, prides and their vanities; those they love are taken from them, and the joy of life is turned to aching grief. The burden of pain, care, misery, grows heavier year by year; at length, ambition is dead, pride is dead; vanity is dead; longing for release is in their place. It comes at last—the only unpoisoned gift earth ever had for them—and they vanish from a world where they achieved nothing; where they were a mistake and a failure and a foolishness; there they have left no sign that they have existed—a world which will lament them a day and forget them forever.

Then another myriad takes their place and copies all they did, and goes along the same profitless road, and vanishes as they vanished—to make room for another and another, and a man. The woman who can make her garder with the same profiless road, and vanishes as they vanished—to make room for a garments at home can have a greater and referred to make room for a garment that fits well, and the myriads, to follow the same arid path thru the same desert, and accomplish what the first myriad and all the myriads that came after it accomplished—nothing.

IN ACTIVE BURGLAR HUNT

"E. M. S." asks for a recipe for lobster salad. Here is one:
Crack the claws after first twisting off the head, which is used in garnishing; split the body in two lengthways. Pick out the meat in bits, but not too fine, saving the coral separate; cut up a large head of lettuce and place on a dish, and upon it lay the lobster, putting the coral around the edge. For a dressing, take the yolks of three eggs, to which add four tablespoofuls of salad oil, dropping it in very slowly. Then add a little salt, cayenne pepper, half a teaspoon of mixed mustard and two tablespoonfuls of vinegar. Pour this over the lobster just before serving. corporal, held at bay for over two hours, and subsequently drove off with considerable loss, a force of Tuareg outlaws, who outnumbered the defenders by nearly 80 to 1.

Owing to the remoteness of the region in which the incident occurred, and the fact that no white officer was present at the time, only the bare facts are yet to hand. From these, it appears that some time in June the British post at Yo was surprised by a raiding band of masked Tuareg, or Tibu people, who infest that part of the Sahara bordering on the Anglo-French frontier on the northwest of Lake Chad, and who have at various times greatly harassed the French.

As is commonly the case in Northern Nigeria, the military quarters and residency are erected outside the native town whose name they bear, and in this case they were in an isolated position on a mound some distance outside the native Town of Yo. For some time the white resident had been absent, having been removed to another centre, and the place, merely ranking as a frontier post, was held only by six native mounted infantry of the West African Frontier Force, under the command of a black corporal, armed only with carbines. Whether the Tuareg came from the British territory, or whether they crossed from the north bank of the Yo River, is not certain, that it appears that the raiders, numbering about 500, looted the native town, and then turned their attention to the tiny garrison on the adjacent hill.

Armed with poisoned arrows and to the tiny garrison on the adjacent hill.

Armed with poisoned arrows and spears, and carrying shields, the Tuareg for a space of two hours made repeated and determined attempts to reach the half-dozen men who were defending the summit from behind a low mud breastwork, but the well-directed efforts of the native troops caused such loss among the Tuareg that they became disheartened, and finally retired. Perhaps the most conspicuous act of gallantry on the part of the garrison was that, at this stage, instead of remaining in the comparative security of their position, they seized their horses and galloped after the retreating raiders, whom they overtook and further severely punished.

One of the West African Frontier Force was wounded. The gallant conduct of the corporal will be brought before the authorities, and he will be recommended for promotion.
