Daily Hints For the Cook

CHERRY PIE. Wash and dry the cherries. Stone them and if large cherry cut them into three or four pieces. Line a deep pie plate with rich crust; brush over it well with the beaten white of an egg. To one cup of fat put a level tablespoon of flour and mix together well; put this with the cherries and a very small pinch of salt, mix well. Now fill the pie plate full. Wet edge of crust with cold water and put on top crust; don't have the crust drawn over the fruit tight, as that will cause juice to seep out; in putting it on push crust toward center of pie, then press edges well together; the wet edge will hold upper crust. Brush over top with the beaten egg white and bake in medium oven until done. Never cut a fruit pie while hot unless it is to be eaten at once, as the juices will run and make crust (no matter how good) soggy.

COUNTRY SCENES. Required: Two ounces of butter, three quarters of a pound of flour, half an ounce of cream of tartar, a quarter of an ounce of carbonate of soda, one ounce and a half of sugar sultana. Rub the butter into the flour, add the cream of tartar, the soda and the sugar, mix into a stiff dough with nearly half a pint of sour milk or buttermilk. Roll out into a round cake, mark this into eight portions, brush over with an egg and bake in a hot oven.

Why We Get Tired By RUTH CAMERON

Few women realize how disproportionately much weariness and exhaustion comes to them from doing some little thing which is beyond their normal strength. A doctor was called in one day by a woman who found that she could not get through her day's work in a comparatively tired out at night. He surprised his patient by asking to see her kitchen. This room was a fairly compact place arranged with some regard to efficiency, and for a while the doctor was puzzled. Then they passed into the dining-room and his face lit up with comprehension. Between the two was a heavy swinging door. "That door ought to stay back, doctor," explained the woman, as she pushed wearily through it and it swung back, "but the catch won't work. I've been meaning to have it fixed for months."

"How many times a day do you suppose you go through that door?" asked the doctor. "I couldn't tell you," answered his patient; "perhaps a hundred."

The door was an exceptionally heavy door, resting to the extent of nearly fifty pounds pressure, according to the doctor's estimate. Every time the housewife passed through it she had to exert that much effort. It was evidently the last straw that broke the camel's back.

The doctor ordered a spring made for the door, but he also prescribed much more emphatically a new catch for the offending door. One over-exertion will tire anybody infinitely more than a dozen exertions. When you make a normal exertion you are simply using your muscles and hence strengthening them. When you over-exert yourself, you tear down and weaken your muscles.

LA MARQUISE DE FONTENOY. The Story of Battle Abbey and its Purchasers—The Monk's Curse—England's Attorney-General. Copyright, 1912, by the Brentwood Company.

Battle Abbey, built by William the Conqueror, and richly endowed in order that the monks should perpetually pray for the souls of those Norman knights who fell at the battle of Hastings, is about to be the scene of another of those Anglo-American marriages that have become so frequent since the day when the abbey was acquired on a long lease by Michael P. Grace of New York, from its then owner, Captain Forester. Mr. Grace's youngest daughter, Gladys, is about to wed Captain Hamilton Grace of the 13th Hussars, thus following the example of several of her sateles, notably the late Mrs. Grace, who became the wife of the Earl of Donoughmore.

Battle Abbey remained in the possession of the monks from the eleventh century until the reign of Henry VIII, who expelled the monks and presented the edifice and its lands to his favorite, Sir Anthony Browne, master of the house, and Knight of the Garter, the story goes that Sir Anthony was celebrating his house-warming in the abbott's hall when a monk suddenly appeared, no one knew whence, and pronounced a solemn malediction upon the spoiler of the church.

The castle was again burned during its subsequent possession by the late Earl of Egmont, on which occasion the huge tower of William the Conqueror, brought thither from Battle Abbey by the Brownes, disappeared in the flames. Rev. J. H. MacKeigan, a boy and contractor, Wetman Pearson, who has so many incomes in the United States and Canada, was the purchaser of the abbey two years ago, chose as his title that of Lord Cowdray.

One of the most famous of the Webster chateaus of Battle Abbey was Miss Elizabeth Vassell, a native of Massachusetts, born in the house which afterwards became the home of Longfellow, and who inherited a very large fortune from an uncle in England. Her marriage with Sir Godfrey Webster, a man twenty-three years her senior, but deserted his first wife, and married her, with the latter resulting in a divorce by act of parliament a few years later. The children of the Webster marriage, a boy and girl were awarded to Sir Godfrey.

But Lady Holland, as she had then become, while she restored the boy to his father, declined to part with the girl, Harriet, in spite of the law. She wrote to Sir Godfrey from the continent that the child had sickened of measles at Modena. In a week's time another letter announced the little girl's death. There was a mock funeral, and a kid was buried in the coffin in place of little Harriet. Three years later, either Lady Holland's conscience smote her, or Sir Godfrey became suspicious, for his daughter was restored to him, and lived to become the wife of Admiral Sir Fleetwood Pellew. Their only child married the fourth earl of Oxford. Lady Harland, it may be recalled, became one of the greatest social powers in London, and Holland House, the centre of political, diplomatic and literary life, in the first half of the nineteenth century. Yet in spite of her unrivalled position and the influence exercised in her behalf by all sorts of great personages, she died in obscurity, and was buried in a pauper's grave.

The successors of her first husband, Sir Godfrey Webster, at Battle Abbey, squandered their wealth, were unable to keep the building in repair, and in 1838 it was sold to Lord Harry Vane, afterwards Duke of Cleveland, who married the widow Lady Dalmeny, mother of Lord Roseberry. The duchess, who survived her husband for many years, bequeathed the abbey to her grandson, Captain Forester, who spent a fortune in restoring it. He eventually sold it for more than a million dollars to the present chief of the Webster family, Sir Augustus, eighth baronet of his line, who was enabled to purchase it by his marriage to the heiress of Henry Crosley of Halifax, chief of the great carpet manufacturing firm—subject, however, to the lease of Michael Grace, who had rented it from Captain Forester. This lease has several years to run, and not until its conclusion will Sir Augustus be able to resume occupation of his ancestral home.

A curious question has arisen in England in connection with the promotion of the attorney-general, Sir Rufus Isaacs, to a seat in the cabinet, a preconcert without precedent, at any rate in modern times. The attorney-general receives a salary of $40,000 a year, and is allowed to continue his private practice of law, so that what with one thing and another, his annual income usually amounts to between $100,000 and $150,000. Indeed, the position, with its emoluments and opportunities, has always been regarded as one of the most lucrative in the gift of the crown. The attorney-general, moreover, is regarded as the leader of the English bar.

Now the successive cabinets during the last ten years have usually included some lawyer of the name of Isaacs, who have, by a sort of unwritten law, been compelled to abandon their private practice while in office—a rule, by the way, which is in force in other European countries, notably in France, where the present premier, M. Poincaré, was obliged to sacrifice his immensely valuable legal business—the largest in France, when he became premier with a salary of $100,000 a year. It is argued that if Sir Rufus Isaacs, now that he is in the cabinet, is allowed to continue his private practice, there is no reason why Premier Asquith, Mr. Balfour, and Mr. McKenna, etc., should not be permitted to do likewise. It would in fact be setting a precedent dangerous to the state.

On the other hand, in England, the attorney-general exercises in some respects judicial prerogatives more important than those of the lord high chancellor, when a man tried for his life and convicted, alleges that there is an error on the record, he cannot take advantage of that error unless he obtains the fiat of the attorney-general, and the same man can present his claim to a peerage before the committee of privileges of the House of Lords. Moreover, the attorney-general has the power, in criminal cases, of entering a "nolle prosequi," or prohibition to prosecute. Over these and other prerogatives equally important, no court in the realm has any control or jurisdiction.

It is therefore advisable that an official of such vast judicial powers should, as a member of the cabinet, be exposed to the suspicion of being swayed by political considerations? MARQUISE DE FONTENOY.
