

ANCIENT LAWS AGAINST DRUNKENNESS.—Domitian ordered all the vine plants in the Roman territory to be rooted out. Charles X. of France issued a similar edict in 1386 under Francis I., a law was passed sentencing drunkards to imprisonment on bread and water for the first offence, a public whipping, banishment, and loss of ears. Drago inflicted capital punishment; Louis XIV. destroyed the vineyards. The Athenians had officers to prevent the excess of drinking. In Rome the patricians were not allowed to use wine until they had attained the 35th year; nevertheless drunkenness was a common vice among the Romans. Aurelianus had officers whose duty it was to in-toxicate foreign ambassadors. Temperance societies are not modern institutions. Stig-mund de Dietrichstein established one in 1810, under auspices of St. Christopher.

A FREAK OF NATURE.—A few days since Dr. David Ash killed a large deer, about three years old (in the township of Loughborough), which had a large pair of horns on the top of the head, also two straight horns, about nine inches in length, which grew from the same root on the forehead, one inch above a straight line drawn from one eye to the other. Mr. Henry Perkins has the head of the four-horned deer at Ockley's Inn, Sydenham, where it may be seen.

ABUNDANCE OF HUMAN LIFE.—To rise early on a cold morning when you have nothing to do.

To suppose that every one likes to hear your child cry, and you talk nonsense to it. That any man should be so foolish as to go to the moon, and undertake to do it, in a world, so overstocked with fools. To give advice to, or argue with a fool. To laugh at the appearance or manners of foreigners, to whom we must feel equally ridiculous.

You cannot keep your own secret, and expect that another should do so for you.

An expert youth in New York has adopted a novel way of raising the wind. Dressed in the deepest mourning, he attends funerals, ascertains the names and habits of the parties, and in a few days calls on their undertaker, requesting his bill for funeral expenses, which, being given him, he presents to the family for collection. In one case he collected $242.
