And being there right through the stock taking season, has been able to secure many lines at prices which two or three weeks later it will be impossible to get.

Having a resident buyer in the Old Country hasproved an unqualified success to the LION. It has enabled us to take the tide at its ebb and secure bargains such as to astonish ourselves.

We are free to take orders at all times, which we send dtreet to our buyer in Glasgow. This is one great advantage which we have over those buyers who go home only once or twice a year.

A Happy New Year to all is the wish of

FRANK DOWLER,

The Great Cash House.

HINTS HOW TO MAKE IT SO.

Keep out of debt, and you are out of danger.
To credit stores a perfect stranger,
Come spend your money at the Great Cash Store,
Where you save 25 per cent or more.
And as the year rolls on, you need not fret,
As no large bills are to be met.

Our business as in the past will be carried on in a strict cash basis, and we can sell Goods cheaper by 20 to 25 per cent, than those houses where you can get goods charged.

We will commence the New Year with a great clearing sale, as we are making arrangements for large deliveries of spring goods, and our space being limited we have get to have the room. Look out for Big Bargains.

At present we are selling Mantles at less than the usual cost price.

Astrachan Mantles left. You buy them almost at your own price.

All are invited to examine our stook and price at

RELLY IMPRISONED IN A SALTMARKET CLOSE

GLASGOW.

Had Lady Clayton the been wife
of Macbesh, she would not have fallen short of the woman who counselled the death of Duncan. No consideration seemed to deter her from the deepest crimes.
Whatever stood between her and her purpose must be removed, no master how it affected others. To her mind it appeared as if everyone had been born to minister to her ambition, or to yield to her requirements. Their rights and feelings were nothing to her—yea, their lives must be ruthlessly sacrificed if the safety or success of her plans required it. Prompt and effectual measures, however ornel and ruthless, were what she always counselled,
and her decided desire was that Nelly Preston, because she had gained a knowladge of their guilt and intentions, should be murdered, to prevent her from using the knowledge to their injury and the defeat of their plan. Fortunately for the girl, however, the policy of Chipps pointed to a milder treatment, and it was decided to despatch her to Glasgow, and keep her there in the custody of Walsh. He procared a large empty house in one of the dingy closes running from the Saltmarket, and made ready two rooms for the purpose. To this secluded spot Nelly was conveyed in the manner we have described, and now she and her jailer were alone.

To do Walsh justice, he used her civilly,
and intruded no further on her privacy than a regard for her safe keeping required, and it had a bolt on the inside of the door which she drew at night. Every day Walsh brought in provisions to full supply, some of which he occasionally asked her to cook for himself, though he generally got his meals at some tavern in the neighborhood.

He went out every night about dusk,

"A few years ago I suffered the entire loss of my hair from the effects of tetter.
I hoped that after a time nature would repair the loss, but I waited in vain.
Many remedies were suggested, none,
however, with such proof of merit as Ayer's Hair Vigor, and I began to use it.
The result was all I could have desired.
A growth of hair soon came out all over my head, and grew to be as soft and heavy as I ever had, and of a natural color, and firmly set."—J. H. Pratt,

He went out every night about dusk, carefully looking the door of the outer room behind him, and seldom returned till after midnight, long before which hour Nelly would lay herself in her couch and listen for his coming, for he always came to the door of her room to know if she had not escaped, and she required to answer him.

Nelly's imprisonment was therefore answer him.

Nelly's imprisonment was therefore neither harsh nor cruel, except in so far as she was deprived of her liberty. Yet her position was a desolate and lonely one. Shut up all day and all night in that dark, dingy chamber, with no one to speak to, and with no hope of her captivity coming to a termination, she was miserable and wretched. Many a time, when Walsh was absent, she would try to gain her liberty by attempting to force the lock of the door, or by striving to attract towards her the notice of any of the neighbors. But in vain. The lock was a strong one, and would not yield to any weak efforts of and would not yield to any weak efforts of hers, and she would find no means of makhers, and she would find no means of making her presence and position known to any one who might be near her. The windows were small, and besides being guarded by iron bars, they were nailed down, and looked out only on the dead
wall of the house on the opposite side of the close. She could often hear voices at a ldistance down in the court or the line, and longed to ory
for assistance; but how could she make herself heard, or, if she could, how would
those who heard her cry be able to search
her out?

her out?
In this way many weeks passed, Walsh treating her with the same sullen civility, and she manifesting toward him a dignified silence. They never conversed together, and only spoke a word or two when necessary.

One afternoon she remarked that Walsh

One afternoon she remarked that Walsh did not as usual leave the house to spend the evening elsewhere, and she wondered what detained him. Occasionally she heard him moaning and breathing heavily, and began to suppose that he must be either drunk or unwell. It grew dusk, then dark, and still she heard himmoaning and tossing to and fro. She looked through the keyhole, and discovered that the room in which he was was quite dark. For a long time she hesitated whether or not to enter, but at length hearing his groans become more loud and distressing, she timilly opened the door and peeped in. All was dark, but presently he moved, and All was dark, but presently he moved, and the sound came from the corner in which the sound came from the corner in which his bed was.

"Are you ill?" she inquired.

"That's nothing to you. Keep your own room," was the gruff, aurly response.

Nelly quietly shut the door and returned to her own chamber, where she lighted the gas and sat down before the fire. The moaning and heavy breathing in the next rooms continued, till, despite the rebuff she bad received, the worse again, and softly room continued, till, despite the rebuff she had received, she rose again and softly opened the door of communication between the two chambers."

"Oan I do anything for you?" she asked.
"You seem to be in great distress."

"Oh,ho; you think I am,do you?" growled Walsh. "You think I am getting too ill to be able to look after you?"

"I was thinking of nothing of the kind," returned Nelly. "I heard you moaning, and want to know if I can give you any. and want to know if I can give you any

"A likely thing indeed; as if you bore meenough of goodwill to help me. I sup-pose you would rather wish to see me dead?"

pose you would rather wish to see me dead?"

"You are mistaken," said Nelly.
"Though you have deprived me of liberty, I would not refuse to assist you in distress. Let me at least light your gas and rekindle the fire."

Walsh replied by a grunt, which Nelly intrepreted as a permission. When the room was lighted she approached her jailer as he lay upon his couch, and saw that he was writhing in pain. His hand was pressed upon his chest as he lay unessily upon his side, his face was very much flushed, and an unnatural brightness glowed in his eye. Inexperienced as Nelly was she saw at a glance that he lay in the first stage of what threatened to be a fierce fever.

"You seem to be very ill," she remarked

"You seem to be very ill," she remarked in a tone of compassion.
"Gurse it! do you think so!" he impatiently exclaimed. "I do feel rather unwell—horribly thirsty, with a burning heat in my breast. Would you mind giving me a drink of water?"

Nelly hastened to make a bowl of thin gruel, and held it to his lips. With what greediness and avidity he drank it up, grasping the bowl with both hands!
Nelly's bands came in contact with his, and she felt them to be as hot as fire.

He lay quiet for a little after drinking the gruel, but suddenly he again grew restless, and without saying a word, rose to his feet again and began pulling towards the back of the door the large box which had brought Nelly from Edinburgh.
