Speeches

My I express to the members and directors of the Bank of Canada my appreciation of their kindness in inviting me to visit the bank which I have just performed in today's ceremony of the laying of the corner stone of the Bank.

The occasion is an historic one in the national life of Canada, and more particularly, in the development of Ottawa as the capital of the Dominion. Like all present things, I feel a special pride, as well as pleasure, in being permitted to share in the proceedings.

Today's ceremony is doubtless associated with the erection of the building, which is to be the head office of the permanent home of the Bank of Canada. It is related to the phase at which the work of the Bank, in its more important functions, is to be carried on, rather than to the functions of the Bank itself, or the place of the Bank in the national economy. Those, already, have been determined by Act of Parliament and, no doubt, from time to time, we shall hear news of them in parliamentary and popular discussions. The
