Children Cry FOR FLETCHER'S CASTORIA

SIDE TALKS

BY RUTH ELLIOTT CAMERON

HAPPY THOUGH MARRIED

"Love isn't strong enough to save people from unhappiness through each other's faults. Do you suppose that so many married people are unhappy in each other because they don't love each other? No, it's because they do love each other that their faults are a mutual torment."

—Howells.

Should married people tell each other their faults and correct each other's unpleasant mannerisms? That is a question which all married people have to face sooner or later, whether they put it to themselves thus baldly or not. The theory of an engagement is that each party is a being without faults.

And Then Comes Marriage

Then comes marriage and turns this illusion inside out. And these newly discovered faults, though not perhaps intrinsically large or important, are magnified by the powerful magnifying glass of nearness, and made vital, as Mr. Howells suggests, by the very fact that the people involved do love each other so much.

What then shall be done about them? Shall these twain seek to keep a hold on happiness by pretending never to have lost the illusion? Or shall they face the fact of their mortal, faulty quality and try to help each other overcome?

Of course this latter process requires much readjustment and initiative fact. But to my mind it is the only way to keep true love alive.

Why the First Year is the Least Happy

I believe that this experience which comes during the first year is the reason why that year, instead of being the happiest, is one of the least happy in most married lives.

I think it is a beautiful thing to have someone to help one overcome one's faults and correct one's mannerisms. I met a woman the other day who had one of those constant, nervous laughs that try the hearer so. It was plain that her husband recognized the ugliness of this mannerism. Why wouldn't it have been much happier for him to tell her that she laughed too much? Surely she would have been happier in the end if she had been helped to conquer this barrier between herself and popularity, and he certainly would have enjoyed her company infinitely more.

Remember "Someone is Married To One"

Of course any suggestions must be made utterly without self-righteousness (remember "not only is one married to someone but someone is married to one") in a spirit of helpfulness not of fault finding, in private, and with infinite tact. Also they should be accompanied by reassurances as to one's unchanged love. And even then, so notable an authority as the feminist, Mr. George disapproves. "There are ideal marriages," he says, "where both parties aim at perfection and are willing to accept mutual criticism. But there is something a little callous in this form of self improvement society."

Doubtless, but what of the opposite solution? Is it any better? Or as good?

LAUDER AND CHAPLIN FORM PATRIOTIC FAN COMBINE.

Two of the world's greatest fun-makers have joined forces to make the world laugh, Harry Lauder and Charlie Chaplin. It is difficult to imagine anything as funny as the comedy these men can produce for they have collaborated on a screen play that will be shown the world over for the benefit of the Lauder Five Million Dollar War Relief Fund. Here they are together having traded hats, canes and smokes, ready to start in to make the world laugh for the war relief.

Rippling Rhymes

THE UNKNOWN ACT.

My aunt came to me, in my lair, and talked while I was busy; I smote her with a rocking chair, and knotted her cold and dizzy. She bled bore her form away, and sent out for a doctor, and I could hear the sawbones say, "The blood has taddy checked her. And, sitting there in solitude, recourse soon drove me dotty; I sighed, "Oh, why am I so rude, unladylike and naughty? Why do I thus my temper lose, o'er every trifling matter, and bombard guests with chairs and shoes, when they come in to chat-ter?" If I had said, "Dear aunt, you see that I'm composing sonnets, so please don't talk just now to me of turbulences and bonnets, I know that she'd have understood, she would no longer tease me, for she's gentle, sweet and good, and always wants to please me. But no, I swat her with a chair, and make her top-knot bloody, and servants drag her by the hair from out my gloomy study. I am a brute! I should be canna!" Ails, that I should raise my hand to such a smooth old lady!" Next day, a sad, repentant man, I went to beg her pardon, and soaked me with the frying pan, and chafed me through the garden.
