Leave orders at Mrs. Hutchinson's, telephone exchange, or telephone No. 10 at Fort Williams.

Corset Covers 19 Cents.

One of the big undergarment factories made up for us a very attractive line of Corset Covers. We asked them to put the best material and trimming into these covers that they could afford, and the price must be low enough to enable us to sell them for 19 cents each. They are made of fine, soft finished cotton, cut full with drawing string at bottom, daintily trimmed with lace edging around neck and armholes, and one row of 1/4 inch lace insertion across front. Sizes from 32 to 38 bust measure.

This pretty Corset Cover will be mailed postpaid to any address in the Maritime Provinces on receipt of 19 cents (one or two cent stamps accepted). Be sure to state size desired.

Order anything you may require in the dry goods line from us. Your letters are given prompt attention, goods being shipped "haste day" as order is received. On amounts of $5.00 or over we prepay delivery charges.

Before it is Too Late.

If you have a grey-haired mother, And from home you are away, Sit down and write the letter You'd all day be day. Don't wait until her old steps Reach heaven's peaty gate, But show her that you think of her Before it is too late.

If you have a tender message, Or a loving word to say, Don't wait till you forget it, But whisper it to-day. Who knows what letter memories May haunt you if you wait? So make your loved ones happy Before it is too late.

The letter never smokes, The long-forgotten messages, For those some hearts are breaking, For those some loved ones wait, So show them that you care for them Before it is too late.

A Question of Honor.

Tom began to wash his face at breakfast. It was so snug and warm under the bed clothes that he lay there full ten minutes after he heard the rising bell ring. He knew it was cold in the room. The frost on the window told him that, and as a further test he had raised his chin above the quilt and, opening his mouth, given a big puff of breath. See! Well, he just guessed he could! It was almost as white as steam. So he dropped down again into the warm bed for those extra ten minutes.

"I can make up the time," he assured himself mentally. "When it's cold I always dress twice as quick." But he missed his calculation and was late to breakfast.

No remarks were made about it, but Tom knew this did not mean that his lateness was unnoticed.

"You know, Tom, it's got to be stopped—this being so late starting the day," his father said as he turned for his fur cap. "As you've lost so much time at the beginning of each day of late, you'd better begin making it up in hard work at the other end. Come directly home from school this afternoon and put in good work on the woodpile till you're called to supper."

If you had known Tom you could have told by the way he went about his chores how hard the decision of his father was for him. He never whined, laughed nor made a joke the whole while. Tom's brother Jack's wife noticed it just the way she always noticed things.

"Jack," she said to her husband after Tom had gone out with the milk pails, and she had to go to clear the milk, "don't you know anything? You know the skating will be fine to-day, and the boys flooded the river back of the barn last night—the mill boys—and the time out of school is little enough anyway."

"Well, father is always thorough when he does a thing. Tom's getting bad ways, Milly, and he puts off the bad that all the time, and works haphazard; that is a very serious way of doing in father's eyes. But there's nowhere a man who means better by his boys."

"Oh, I know that," Milly answered. "But she's always lived in the West, herself, and though there was not a better housekeeper to be found for miles around, Milly's nature, sunny and sympathetic, was not quite capable of understanding the stern strength her father-in-law seemed to have inherited from his Puritan ancestors. And Tom's mother was a Southern girl, and Tom, she felt sure, was like his mother. It was four years now since Milly had married Jack and come to keep house on the Newton farm. But whatever Milly's inner thoughts might be, she was always loyal to Jack's father—always. But sometimes her heart went out to loving care-free Tom a little pityingly when the father's determination and the boy's love of freedom clashed.

She was alone in the kitchen when Tom re-entered with a brimming milk pail. A cold blast of air followed the boy in. Without turning he gave the door a kick not quite strong enough

Even as he spoke he began unfastening his skates, and without another word from either of them, he led the way up the path.

"It was awful good of you, Milly," he understood better than if she had told him in words, how she was seeking to help him to be a good son. Tom hurried on ahead, and when Milly reached the house and glanced back she saw Tom working for dear life in the lean-to of the hay barn, working as though he would gladly make up for lost time.

"Maybe he will," she said, turning to her work. If he works like a heaver, he may do as much as though he had come straight home. But if he would only do as he should! He means well, but falls out by the way."

"The barn's on fire!" They built the fire to warm their hands—the boys! Oh, Milly!

Quick as a flash, Milly caught a plank of wood, and seeing her, Tom caught up another pail. But all hope died in a short quarter of an hour before the fire was under control. The boys, puffing out from the barn on the side nearest the river. The boys were shouting like mad, and tumbling wildly for more pails to the mill. The wind was keen, the air clear. The mill hands were soon at work, but the fire was ahead of them. It was only the space of a short quarter of an hour before all knew Milly was right when she cried, "It's no use! It's no use!" and the brave little woman dropped her pail and nursed her tired arm. "It's got to go. There's no help for it."

But the boys and men worked to the last and then they, too, stood back and watched the blazing hay fall down in great heaps, and then the leaping flames as the dry wood began to burn.

"Well, we have done the best we could, Tom," Milly said.

"Yes, but I don't know what father will say."

"He'll say, 'such things will happen, if he's what I take him for,' said Milly. You know he somehow doesn't mind the big things quite as we little folks do."

But Tom dreaded his father's coming. When he came, it was not quite as Tom had expected. Both Jack and Mr. Newton heard of the fire when they were out for their morning walk, and so they had talked the matter over, settled the fact that it couldn't be helped, and that the insurance would cover it. And so Tom did not come to the foreground in the matter as much as he had expected. Mr. Newton had made some remark about hoping it would be a lesson to the boys about fire, and then the talk had again turned to the matter of insurance and as to whether the adjuster would likely be along soon.

But before going to bed Tom came to Milly, who was mixing bread at the kitchen table.

"Milly, do you think I should tell father under what is on my mind? It's just the same now as though I had split as much as he thinks I did. Probably I would have all been burnt up if I had split it."

There was a tired worried look in the boy's eyes. Milly would have liked to put her hand on the lad's and tell him it was not necessary, but she could not. No, not even for the love of the boy. She could help him in some things, but when it came to the question of honor, he might fight it out for himself.

"You might go to bed and think of it over tonight," she said.

Tom drew a long breath, turned sharply, and made straight for his father's room.

A little later the father's hand was on the boy's head and the boy was standing with his eyes fastened on his father's face with a look that was new.

"Well, Tom, I am glad you told me. We've been gaining anything by taking advantage of circumstances to stand better in the eyes of others than we really are. I am glad you told me. I shall always feel that I can trust you a little more, knowing you did tell me. There, go to bed. It's been a hard day for you. The insurance covers the loss, but it's a bother. If it reaches you boys more care, there will be something accomplished." Then he added, "I'm glad you told me, Tom." Tom walked straight from the room.

"If I ever go back on father again," he muttered, "I hope I will not be there to see myself!"

He did not stop for a word with Milly. Somehow, he did not care to see anyone, but just to be alone with this feeling of new gladness that was his. He felt he had never before quite known what his father was like.

Women's Wonderful Nerve.
There was a remarkable display of cool courage in a terrible situation on the part of two women parachutists named Daisy Shepard and Louise May at Longton, Staffordshire. Both women, with their parachutes vent up attached to one balloon, intending to descend from a height of 7000 feet. One parachute, however, became entangled in the netting, and the balloon shot up to an immense height, to the great anxiety of the crowd. Miss Shepard, who could have made her descent alone, would not leave her companion. At a height of 7000 ft., failing to release her parachute, she was forced to make a desperate leap through the air from one trapeze to the other, and the two women descended to the earth on the one parachute. They landed in a field at Leigh, eleven miles from Longton. Miss Shepard being seriously injured in the fall.—Standard of Empire.

Proved Beyond Doubt.
The disappointed victims of poor Catarrh remedies should read the statement of J. R. Smith, of Lake Street, N. B., in Catarrhose. He found an absolute cure and says: "Last winter my little girl of eight caught cold which lodged higher ears in the form of Catarrh. She became sick and deaf and nothing helped. By inhaling Catarrhose she got relief and gradually the discharge went away. She was cured perfectly of Catarrh. Personally I can recommend Catarrhose for coughs and throat irritation; it's a wonderful medicine." Sold everywhere, 50c, and $1.00.

How To Save Work In The Home
Most of the dust in the modern home comes from the floor. It is made, if you would use Floorplate right. And dust isn't merely a bother for the housewife and the maid. It's a danger. Dust specks do no good. The germs of all infectious diseases, in fact, flourish in the dust. Floorplate reduces floor-dust to a minimum.

When you coat a floor with any of the ten shades of Floorplate 2-2-2 you have a floor that is creviceless, washable, and impervious to the mop-water, and nearly dust-proof.

You will get weary watching for it to wear off that floor. Floorplate stands up to the most severe wear, and it's a perfect. Imperial Varnish & Color Co., Limited, of Toronto.
