pelfish. I could have wished, of course, that it had been some one who—some one whom I knew and loved, but——"

There lurked in this broken sentence an allusion that Randolph understood—an allusion to a cherished hope of his mother's. Perhaps he felt in some way guilty, for he made no direct reply, saying only:

"You will know Cella, mother, and you will love her. You cannot help it."

"I hope so," said the poor woman, with the best smile that she had for the occasion." When shall I see her? Would it not be well for me to call on her mother?"
Randolph Wykoff went away from this Interview with an easy mind and a heart filled with loving admiration of his mother. She was a wonderful woman, he thought, thus to combine feminine gentleness with masculine common-sense. How kindly and how wisely she had taken it! It did not come into his mind that in the course of that brief conversation he had been led to propose and to pledge himself to two things which he had never thought of beforefist, that there should be no announcement of his engagement, in fact—for a year to come; second, that the engagement should be of not less than a year's duration from the dete of the announcement. These two ideas scened to have been of his own conception. He knew, or he thought he knew, how much personal aunoyance his marriage to Celia Leete would bring him. He had no desire to add to this annoyance, or be guilty of a precipitancy which he himself fould not excuse. His world would be ill-spoken enough; it was not for him to justify unkind criticism. It came to him as the most natural thing imaginable that Celia Leete ought to be introduced to some of his friends, at least, as Celia Leete, before they knew her as a his betrothed. And he could hardly get his present business off his hands and feel free to devote himself to a wile short of a year or two of hard work.

Mrs. Leete's mother showed a mouth that seemed to be simply a straight line where the lips turned in. What little hair she had hung in a large flat festoon on either side of her head. A broad lace collar covered her shoulders. It was lastened under the chin by a brooch of rast size, which was, in fact, a box with a plass front, designed, apparently, to contain specimens of the hair of deceased members of the wearer's family, after the depressing fashion of the days of ambrotypes and inchoate civilization. would not have admitted to herself.

Why does your thoroughbred collie bark at the tramp or the peddler within your gates, and greet shabblest gentlehood with a friendly wag of the tail? It is because there is in dogs, and the dogs know it. The human beings know it, too, although there are some who belie their knowledge—who, having learned that the rank is but the guinea's stamp and that the man's the gowd for a' that, go about trying te make themselves and others believe that there is no such thing as an alloy in the world, no counterfeit coin, no base metal.

Mrs. Leete was a gitated even to her inmost spiritual recesses when she saw this bandsome and well-dressed woman rise and come forward to meet her, with such an easy grace and dignity—with such as soft rustling of her black raiment. It was five minutes at least before the perfect tact that had put the how soutward and visible things. After a little, Call and a pale face, from, with cold had canne shyly into the Mrx. Mr. J. R. Allen, upnolsterer, Toronto, sends us the following: "For six or seven years my wife suffered with Dyspepsia, Costiveness, Inward Piles and Kidney Complaint. We tried two physicians and any number of medicines without getting any relief, until we got a bottle of Northrop & Lyman's Vegetable Discovery. This was the first relief she got, and before one bottle was used the benefit she derived from it was beyond our expectation."
