THE DOUBLE DISCOVERY. BY B. E. P. "Yes, mether, I think that will be our only way, until I can get something to do,"

swept away the happiness of the late Judge Gorden's home! Husband and fasher, brother and son lost the homestead and its furniture sold—yes, even the family portraits too—to satisfy elamorous creshiters.

Love. "The young Gorden who went to the war, and was reported dead?"

"The same, sir. I was sorely wounded, and left for dead. A kind kearted Southern family took care of me, but mout a passed of which I have no recollection. I was unable to leave my bed for more than a year. Letters were written, at my desire, to my family. I never received a

The blood rushed warmly to Nellie's pale cheek as she read this, and she murmured:

"As, if I can but obtain that place! It is not far from where dear mother is. But it is probably filled by this time! I must try—I can but fail, as I have been failing all day."

With breathless haste she hurried on until she arrived at the advertised number, a handsome cottage, surrounded by a large flower garden, and timidly made known her business to the invalid lady, Mrs. Leon. Fortune favored her, and she was at once engaged.

at once engaged.

Weeks passed on; and as an intimacy existed between the families of Major Love existed between the mother and daughter and Mrs. Leon, the mother and daughter often met, and in secret wept over the past, and encouraged each other against the present and future.

Mrs. Gorden saw but little of Major

Love, to whom she was known only as Mrs. Black, the housekeeper; but at length his daughter Lottie graduated from a distant school, and came home to live with her father.

Mrs. Gorden then learned how fond and proud of this only daughter was the calm and stately Major Love. The kind and amiable manners of Lottie at once endeared her to Mrs. Gorden, whose heart was ever yearning toward the young. Lottie, too, reminded the widow of her Nellie, whom she could not have always with her.
Though of different styles of beauty—Nellie being a blonde, and Lottie a brûnette—their manners were remarkably alike.

Mrs. Leon, the invalid, had become attached to her young and patient companion, and treated her more as a daughter than one hired to be a mere companion. Fearing lest it might be discovered by some of their inquisitive former acquaintances that she and her daughter had become so pressed by want as to be forced to fill positions almost menial, Mrs. Gordon had kept their relationship secret, and admitted only a remote tie of kindred and similarity of name.

They little dreamed that these precau-one were filling with anguish the heart one who dearly loved them, and who was seeking day and night to find what had become of the widow and daughter of Judge Henry Gordon.

Nor did they ever glance at the daily newspapers, or certainly they would have seen this startling advertisement:

"To me, too," sighed Lottie; "but I really do not know my Harry's last name, Nellie. I heard some one call him Harry, and no more."

"Poor brother!" sobbed Nellie; "he was brave, and he loved the Union. He did not go to fight for riches and renown, but for the flag of Washington. Like thousands of others, he left a fond mother and sister and a happy home, and died one of the unknown defenders of our country."

Not many days after this conversation, a young gentleman sprang from a sarriage en Wall street and hurried into the office of Major Love, and presented himself to Tears started in Major Love's eyes as he ontinued: "I loved Henry Gorden, and I have said Nellie Gorden, a beautiful girl of 14, to her widowed mother, as they spoke of the ruture—a future so lone and drear to their beteaved hearts.

They had been rich.

They were poor now. Six months only had passed since Nellie's father's death, but during that time what sad changes had swept away the happiness of the late rented a small room, Mrs. Gorden had gladly accepted the position of housekeeper in the family of Mr. Love, and returned to inform her daughter.

"Yes, Nellie, there are but three in Major Love's family besides the servants: himself, his daughter Lottie, and a little boy.

"A sad change it is for me, my child. A few months ago the envied wife a popular and supposed wealthy judge, and now to become the housekeeper of a stranger, as poor, penniless Mrs. Black!"

"God help as, dear mother."

"They parted, and Nellie went forth to seek employment. Disappointment and rebuff had almost crushed the spirit of the woome in the bank for you, your mother and your sister. Your father deposited over a hundred thousand dollars in my hands a year before he died. That was one reason why I advertised. Come, we will put our heads together and seek for the missing ones. Here is the number of my residence; you must make my house your home while you remain in New York. By the way, we will not speak of business to-day—time enough for that to-morrow. This is my daughter's birthday. I have a little party at my house in honor of the event to-night. You promise to come? To-morrow you shall come and live with us, and we will move heaven and earth to find your mother, poor lady! Here, you may need money to pay your friend what you owe him."

"I must attend to business, and not pleasure, until we meet at my house." He parted with the young gentlemen cordially; and Harry sighed as he returned to their hotel, for the strange disappearance of his mother and sister weighed heavily upon his heart.

When Major Love returned to his house on that evening, he was greatly pleased with the preparations Mrs. Gordon had made for the party.
"Ha!" he said, as he rubbed his hands and surveyed the parlors. "You are a valuable woman. I know the young folks will enjoy themselves, Mrs. Black." Then, as he glanzed over the stylish supper-table and its splendid array, set set forth under the supervision of Mrs. Gordon with admirable taste, he said: "Mrs. Black, I am proud of you. So is Mrs. Black, I am proud of you. So is Lettie. By the way, you and my friend Mrs. Leon have become great friends. I hope you and she—being the only married ladies to be present—will take entire charge of the whole affair. That beautiful girl, Nellie Black, must be here too. Very good indeed, Mrs. Black. It is very plain that you understand all these things as well as my wife did."

Mrs. Gordon hurried away, fearing that

Major Love was wild with, first wonder and then delight, and so was everybody else; and so happy a birthday party never was before nor since.

Well, my story is done. Lottie is Mrs. Harry Gordon now. Nellie is soon to wed Captain Waverly. Mrs. Gorden, restored to the position she adorned while her husband lived, is calm and happy, though there is a whisper that Major Love was so pleased with her skill as a housekeeper, that he is suspected of wishing to make

Almost every person has some form of serofulous poison latent in his veins. When this develops in serofulous sores, ulcers or eruptions, or takes the form of rheumatism or organic diseases, the suffering that ensues is terrible beyond description. Hence the gratitude of those who discover, as thousands yearly do, that Ayer's Sarsaparilla will thoroughly eradicate this evil from the system.
