I ordered the men to leave my office instantly and used some that words in giving expression to my wishes. They did not go, but listened with a strange sort of patience to what I had to say. After a time I cooled a little and sat down and told them there was nothing in the desk except a few soraps of paper, half a dozen letters and some of the instruments and medicines that formed my stock in trade.

"Is there any money there?" said the man who had spoken.

"Money! Certainly not," I answered, and I laughed at the idea. "What little money I have is here," and I exhibited a pocket-book so thin as to suggest experiments in a rolling mill.

With an air of triumph I returned my pocketbook to its place and told my visitors they had better go. As they-declined to do so I became sarcastic and quizzed them about the weather or anything else that occurred to me. The man wanted something for a child suffering from an over-doze of plum padding. I gave him a simple remedy and received my first fee, half a dollar, which included the medicine.

I unlocked my desk. In search of some paper in which to wrap the medicine, bomething green and solided lay there, but I did not observe it particularly, as I was not fully awake and the desk was in dark corner. I had been experimenting with littuus paper and acids and presumed, if I presumed anything, that this was one of the slips I had dipped in some coloring liquid and reserved for future use and examination.

When my patron had gone I returned be desk was and in that sleep what dreams may (and did come. Half an hour after I was again aroused, and this time three men entered, one of them being my late customer.

"Success has come at last," I remarked to my wife. "May be might be prospectus and happy."

"Explain yourself."

"This is the matter," said one of the trio, and as he spoke he advanced to my desk. I had left the key in the look when I wrapped up the medicine for my fifty-cent customer and it was still there. The stranger laid his hand upon the key and I sprang forward.

another knock and the door was opened by one of my visitors.

A fourth man entered and presented a paper. It was a warrant for my arrest!

While I stood fairly dumb with astonishment one of the men opened my desk and called the others and myself to observe that two national bank notes of $100 each were lying among the letters and paper acraps.

I was led away to the office of the magistrate who had issued the warrant and there learned the reason of my arrest. The case was so strong against me that I was committed at once; the grand jury was in session, and they promptly found

When I came home and went to bed.

Next morning when the sun was done thinging the hilltops above the village and was mounting into the sky I was routed by a knocking at the door. I did not rise with alacrity and was not in the best of temper as I stepped into my clothes and prepared to see my visitor. I am sure I presented an unamiable appearance and was not as calm as was my wont. I was dreaming of Kate at the moment I was awakened and it wasn't pleasant to be summoned thus to the sober realities of life.

"Quite likely," I answered, "but not at all dangerous. What are the symptoms!"
"You probably know yourself."
"Is it the same case!" I asked as I turned to him who had waked and called me early,
The three exchanged glances and then one of them said it was.
"Has there been any alarming development!" was my next query.
