THE FOG WILL LIFT.

The fog will lift before the day is done; Already through the mist, spectral and pale, Half gleams the glory of the summer sun, Half he disdains to draw the fleecy vail.

And now, as suddenly, it sinks from sight; lut slowly, slowly, the gray fog will lift, And yet again the earth and sky be bright.

Now through the space a stately mast ap pears,
As suddenly a breezy sail doth shift—
Hope's messenger of ocean seen through As o'er the wave the filmy fog doth lift.

o from my fate the fog shall lift full soon; Hope is not dead because the sun be hid; murky morning brings a radiant noon; The sunny eye will surely lift its lid. And more and more unto the perfect day drift; A clearer vision comes with evening's ray; Before the day is done the fog will lift.

WRECKED. BY CASS.

Tossed aloft on mighty billows, Borne along in crael glee, Sped a good ship to destruction, O'er the tempest-riven sea.

Mounting high with frenzied dash, tound the coast the waves are gleaming, Lit up by the lightning flash.

On towards the roaring breakers,

Through the surf and through the foam
Speeds the good ship to destruction,
Speeds the good ship to her home.

Then a few poor spars and timbers, Tossed upon the shore at length,

Tossed upon the shore to linger, Crushed and useless many a day, Till another mighty tempest, Pitying, bears the wreck away. So full often have I noticed Men by nature bold and brave, Tossed aloft 'mid Sorrow's tempest, Buffeted by wind and wave; Drifted in among the breakers Lifted high with angry roar; Bruised and crushed, the spirit broken, Cast a wreck upon the shore.

There to lie in shame and anguish Raising not the head again.
Till in mercy comes Death's billow,
Hiding them and all their pain.
