

CONTENTS

CHAPTER I

THE FALL OF QUEBEC.

PAGE

The victories of 1759 — Indifference in Britain about later events — The deaths of Wolfe and Montcalm — The position of the French after the battle of September 13 — A Council of War — The decision to retire to Jacques Cartier — The retreat of the French army — The situation in Quebec — The Chevalier de Lévis — His decision to march back to Quebec — The British plans for attack — The difficulties of Ramezay, Commander in Quebec — The weakness of the defences — Scarcity of food — Panic in Quebec — A Council of War in Quebec — Ramezay's decision to surrender — Negotiations with the British — The second retreat of the French army — Dark outlook for the French cause — The menace to Montreal — Amherst on Lake George — His delays — The attack of Rogers on the St. Francis Indians — The Massacre — Amherst fails to press his attack on Montreal

9

CHAPTER II

QUEBEC DURING THE WINTER OF 1759-60.

British thanksgiving for victory — Preparations for the winter — State of ruin in Quebec — The departure of the British fleet — The career of James Murray, Commander at Quebec — French hopes to recapture Quebec — The weak defences of Quebec — Attitude of the French Canadians — Murray's plan of defence — Savage practices in the war — French ships get away to France — A disastrous explosion — The French inhabitants — Murray's strict rule — His suspicions of the priests — Discipline in the army — The zeal of the soldiers — The Nuns of the Ursuline Convent — The Nuns of the General Hospital — The care of the sick — The French officers at the Hospital — The Nuns of the Hôtel Dieu — The bitter cold in Quebec — The difficulties in securing fuel — The lack of fresh provisions — Disease in Quebec and many deaths — Rumours of French designs . . .

46