

CANADA
AND THE UNION JACK

CANADIANS can never fully appreciate the value of their great heritage consequent upon the momentous event of 1759, when Wolfe and his brave followers scaled the heights and the heroic General died victorious on the Plains of Abraham, and when Canada, now extending from ocean to ocean, came under the British Flag. Citizens of no country on earth have greater reason to be proud of their flag than those of the Dominion of Canada, a nation within the great British empire, enjoying the greatest freedom under good constitutional government, regarding which Sheridan said long years ago: "The King is not seated on a solitary eminence of power, but on the contrary sees his equals in the co-existing branches of the legislature and recognizes his superior in the law."
