[41]

about

at last

clear :

come

Peace

fome-

t, and

at they

he:Cla-

opolad

red, by

le, and

ill ever

ere not

rld by

cenfur

Council

d; and

e been

lour a-

fond of

reaties,

n and

s Men

at Act.

Iam

onduct

ements

all its

our fu-

y judi-

and in

jr,

it, that we shall never make a better. Though it had been certainly more for our Interest to have then ruined France, at forty Millions additional Expence, than now, with the same Inconvenience. have given her Reason to hope the may one Day retrieve all the Dishonour she was subjected to by Marlborough's Victories. The plain Question now before us is, not whether we have made so good a Peace as the Nature and Gircumstances of Things would permit; but whether the War has been so conducted on the Principles of fair Reason. ing, as that we might at any Time have commanded a better: And then it remains to be considered, whether, even in the Situation we at last found ourselves, there was any Kind of Necessity for fuch extraordinary Condescensions, as is intimated to have been made, at the Expence of our Honour as well as Interest. As to the Conduct of our Navy, besides what has been spoke of in the preceeding States of the Nation, it is here farther to be observed, that Great Britain never fitted out fo many Ships of all Ranks, nor to fo little Purpose. This Matter was as little considered in Point of Judgment as Oeconomy, as has been but too evident in all the several Appointments where our Navy has been stationed. In a Book levely published, giving us an Account of Mr. Anlos voyage, we find this important Remark: Ther, on the Genturion's coming out of Canton River, a Chinese appeared on one of the Forts armed Cap-a-pie, intended, as the Author feems to suppose, to strike some Kind of Terror into those who beheld his heroick Figure, and consequently to deter