

thrilling and often romantic incidents. It was here that the adventurous La Salle dreamed of a new route to India, and it was from this point that he started on that memorable voyage which resulted in the discovery of the Mississippi.

It is not too much to say that Kingston is, with the exception of Quebec, more picturesquely and beautifully situated than any other City in Canada. Rising on a gentle slope from the water's edge, with the noble St. Lawrence gemmed with the Thousand Islands stretching to the east, with Lake Ontario and the beautiful Bay of Quinte to the west and the Cataraqui River flowing from the northeast. Nature seems to have exhausted herself in making a magnificent picture fit to form a background for a beautiful City.

When visiting Kingston we want particularly to draw your attention to the Clothing and Furnishing Establishment of C. LIVINGSTON & BRO., 75-77-79 Brock Street. This well known firm are direct importers of fine woollens and exclusive men's furnishings. Right prices and courteous attention to customers together with the largest and most up-to-date stock of woollens for custom tailoring, men's furnishings and ready-to-wear clothing between Toronto and Montreal, have built up for this firm an enviable reputation for reliable goods.

The City presents some old-time aspects which in this modern, work-a-day world are restful and carry us back to the time when money was not the be-all and end-all of existence. Could the ground on which the Tete De Pont Barracks stand tell us its tale of human joy and suffering, it would read like a romance. Old Fort Henry and the Martello Towers, guarding the harbor and City, rouse in the thoughtful those sentiments which inspired Wolfe on the evening before the taking of Quebec to dwell on that melancholy line from Gray's Elegy, "The paths of glory lead but to the grave." It is said that Great Britain spent over a million dollars on these massive fortifications which made Kingston at the time they were erected the most strongly fortified place in Canada with the exception of Quebec. But the friendship between Great Britain and the United States which is being cemented more firmly as the time goes on is the best protection for our frontier. The only invasion we now look for from the great Republic to the south of us is one of summer tourists and we shall always gladly welcome them.

Apart from its prominence as a military post, Kingston has many points of great interest. Its public buildings, especially the City Hall and Court House, are very fine, the grey limestone turned almost white by age looking like marble in the sunlight. Other places of interest are Queen's University with 1,500 students, the Penitentiary, Rockwood Asylum, Royal Military College, Tete de Pont Barracks, Fort Frederick, the Old Block House, City Hospital, Hotel Dieu, St. George's Cathedral, St. Mary's Cathedral, Armouries, the City Park, Macdonald Park and the Government Dry Dock.

The City itself is well laid out and the streets well lined with beautiful shade trees. Being a place of 20,000 inhabitants it can give the tourist all the conveniences of City life while at the same time offering him all the charms of the country. Its stores are equal to those of many places twice the size and are stocked with a full assortment of the very latest styles of goods at prices which in many lines are far below those in the cities across the border.
