Senator Collum tells a good story and, not being given to practising law much himself, I suppose he can afford to do so—of a prospereus store keeper, in a small Illinois town, the name of which has escap ed me, who once practised law but who has long since abandoned it. Being met by an old acqaintance, he was asked for all the particulars of his leaving his profession.

'Didn't it agree with your health?
'Oh, yes,' answered uncle Joe, as he was familiarly called by his winter, were taken up again. Baseball particularly was the rage at the school nine stood second on the list of school clubs, and with a very good showing for first place. Indeed, it was to be decided by a contest in June with the Belville High School nine—the champion club—whether or not it was entitled to first place. Hill and Harris, the battery of the school nine, were confident that with practice their nine could win the first place. Very well, then, why not have the practice? The why was simple enough: the school grounds were not large enough for the purpose. But there was the village common, which was exactly what was needed, and there was the village common, which was exactly what was needed, and there was but one reason why it did not answer the purpose: the village boys, headed by the son of the village to the school nine was going out at the then withdrew a few paces, and in a matter of fact way begand to take off his colar, and after the first place. The bad work at the bat was some that the school him pace is dead up and laid upon a spot entitle that is carefully dusted with his pocket-handkerchief—used on ine—the champion club—whether that is suspenders; Then he took his blue silk handkerchief—used on ining. It was growing late, and it was a greed that the eight innings should be the last. Harris are to arrange it with a due regard for appearances. Stokes watched this perfermance with a broad grin on his face, but the school-beve enough for the purpose. But there was the village common, which was exactly what was needed, and there was the village common, which was exactly what was needed, and there was but one reason why it did not answer the purpose: the village boys, headed by the son of the village to the purpose in the purpose of the village common, which was exactly what was needed, and there was the village boys, headed by the son of the village to the village mon and spread themselves over it so that the boys could not play. The village nine had been beaten by the school nine, and they were jealous.

Hill had tried force to maintain his rights, and the result was that the village boys proved themselves the stronger, and consequently were no longer contented with strategy, but would gather in force and drive the school nine off the common whenever it tried to play there. Fulkerson was not in the way of hearing the details of this feud, but he felt all the enthusiasm of the championship contest, and would have given anything he

"I guess not," answered Stokes, "Tell Fulkee what to do," suggested Harris.

"Don't sav a word to him." replied Hill. "Don't you see how nervent was a word to him." replied Hill. "Don't you see how nervent was certainly something very business-like in the way Fulkerson up his hands, and something decided by quick in the way be made a feint at Stokes. It was only a feint, but it brought about a change in the stopped smiling at once. Again Fulkerson in the mean time realized as well as any one how much strikes."

The two hoves faced each other

However, if he could not play in the match, he could at least watch the practice games, and so he went one day with the nine to the common.

The head of the illege bys went home. There was a way from and back to the bags. Feint show of playing ball on the the practice games, and so he went one day with the nine to the common. The boys were ahead of the villagers, and had fairly started their game, when the latter, with Dan Stokes, the butcher's boy, at their head, came burneries down unsuper the scale of the school boys, but it did not last long. The absorbing sensation was Fulkerson. In this strait he had recourse to one of the smaller boys, who explained to him the whole case. thusiasm of the championship contest, and would have given anything he possessed could he have been one of the famous nine. He never breathed a word of such a vaulting ambition, and it is as well he did not, for the boys would not have failed to remember one occasion on which on which he had been on the cut-skirts of the play ground when a stray ball came his way. He had put up his hands to stop it, and it had gone through them, to use Harris's expression, as if it had been buttered.

who explained to him the whole case. If Fulkerson had not had the evidence of the stery before him he would not been able to believe it. As it was he said. "Outrageous!" and after a moment of hot self-communion, ran to Hill and Harris as they were doggedly moving away. "Leok here, Hill." he said, "what makes you let them drive you off like this? Come back. I'll stand by you."

This offer of Fulkerson's would have been very funny at any other time. Now it only served to show his interest in the game, and Hill answered, "We've tried that, but Dan Stokes is too much for any two of us; if it wasn't for him it would be easy enough."

It was he said. "Outrageous!" and after a moment of hot self-communing up with a bianched face, saying, breathlessly, "Simpson, year and the doctor has come and says he mustn't go out of his room."

Then Hill and Harris turned pale, and with sinking hearts demanded if the information was authentic. And when it seemed that it was "all up" with the game, and Hill answered, "We've tried that, but Dan Stokes is too much for any two of us; if it wasn't for him it would be easy enough."

When the case of the stery hefore him he wishing and not had the glove of the day, when a lower-class boy came running up with a bianched face, saying, breathlessly, "Simpson year late, the glow of the school of him heard the patter, patter of his feet, heard his panting breath, saw his white cap and was passed.
